When DiCaprio and Kate Winslet boarded that boat to the Big Nowhere, they surely had no idea that college students would sell everything but their souls to see the movie over and over.

I don't know DiCaprio and Winslet personally, but I don't think they would want that for America's youth.

Fight the man. Boycott the video. Save your pennies.

Let's sink this damn ship.

House Republicans urge release of testimony

By DAVID ESPO
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — House Republicans are seeking speedy release of President Clinton's videotaped grand-jury testimony, officials said Monday as the two top Democrats in Congress urged the White House to abandon a defense against Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's evidence based on legal technicalities.

Several GOP sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said there had been discussions of releasing Clinton's testimony later this week in the next batch of material to be made public from Starr's voluminous report.

Lawmakers in Clinton's own party are likely to oppose release of the videotape, one lawmaker said, if not the written transcript of the Aug. 17 testimony in which the president defended his earlier claims under oath that he had not had sexual relations with Monica Lewinsky.

At the White House, spokesman James Kennedy issued a statement noting that Clinton's lawyers have said Starr's allegations would not support a case of perjury in a court of law.

"Nevertheless, the president has made clear that he doesn't want the work of his lawyers to get in the way of his admission that he had an improper relationship and misled people to keep it private," Kennedy said.

He issued the statement after the Democratic leaders of Congress, Sen. Tom Daschle of South Dakota and Rep. Dick Gephardt of Missouri, broke a three-day silence on Starr's report.

Neither expressed an opinion on whether the evidence added up to impeachable offenses.

In written statements issued while both men were in New York for fund-raising appearances with Clinton, they urged the president to abandon his lawyerly defense.

"The considered judgment of the American people is not going to rise or fall on the fine distinctions of a legal argument but on straight talk and the truth," Gephardt said.

"I certainly agree with those who have grown impatient with hairsplitting over legal technicalities," Daschle said.

Daschle also said Congress should consider a post-election session if it is necessary for a "prompt, appropriate conclusion in the public interest."

He also broached the possibility of other means to address the president's conduct, in what appeared to be a reference to censure or some other discipline besides impeachment.

Democrats have been discussing such punishment in recent days. One aide said lawmakers are talking among themselves about "censure plus," a sanction that might require Clinton to reimburse the government for part of Starr's probe.

CLINTON

Public opinion polls released over the weekend indicate a majority of the public favors censure but favors Clinton remaining in office.

That didn't deter Republicans from continuing to call for Clinton's resignation. Adding their names to the list during the day were Rep. John Kasich, R-Ohio, a potential presidential candidate in 2000; Rep. Greg Ganske, R-Iowa; and Alabama Republican Reps. Bob Riley and Terry Everett.

In addition, Joe Turnham, the former state Democratic chairman who is now running against Riley, called a news conference to ask the president to resign.

Clinton did not address the controversy during the day, traveling to New York for an economic speech and campaign fund-raisers for Democrats.

His White House was increasing its staff to fight possible impeachment proceedings even as several battle-hardened veterans headed for the door. Officials were having discussions about bringing onboard Greg Craig, a State Department official with experience on Capitol Hill to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's staff. Craig also is a former partner of Clinton attorney David Kendall.

Clinton is expected to lose Rahm Emanuel, a key aide, and is losing his press secretary, Mike McCurry, and probably chief of staff Erskine Bowles, who is expected to return to North Carolina to get ready to run for governor.

Democrats and Republicans alike said the Judiciary Committee was eager to expedite the release of more Starr material.

Parts could be released before Sept. 28, one aide said.

Under legislation approved by the House last week, the bulk of Starr's material is to become public on that date. Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., the committee's chairman, said the panel would not release material that might damage the reputation of innocent individuals.

"It appears that there's more to come, and we would be well served to consider it," Hyde said.

He said he was basing his comment on a brief section of Starr's report in which the independent counsel noted other portions of his probe remained open.

GOP sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Republicans particularly are eager to have Clinton's grand-jury testimony made public. He testified from the White House on Aug. 17 via closed-circuit television and defended his statements in an earlier deposition in Paula Jones' sexual-harassment lawsuit that he and Lewinsky had not had a sexual relationship.

Starr's report includes numerous descriptions of sexual encounters between Clinton and Lewinsky in the vicinity of the Oval Office, although sexual intercourse is not alleged.

Clinton's legal team consistently has denied the president committed perjury.

"You can't make a case that he didn't lie in January," Sen. Bob Kerrey, D-Neb., said, speaking on Clinton's testimony in the Jones deposition.

"As to his denial in the Jones deposition that he and Lewinsky had had a 'sexual relationship,' the president maintained that there can be no sexual relationship without sexual intercourse, regardless of what other sexual activities may transpire," Starr wrote in a 445-section of the report made public last week.

"He stated that 'most ordinary Americans' would embrace this distinction," the report said.

At one point, according to Starr's report, Clinton spoke in defiant terms. He said, for example, that receiving oral sex was not included in a description of sexual relations that the judge in the Jones case had approved.

"Let me remind you, sir, I read this carefully," Clinton told the grand jury, referring to the description, according to Starr's report.

Texas quarterback to miss Saturday's game against Cats

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUSTIN, Texas — Your starting quarterback is sidelined with a broken bone in his throwing hand. His backup has yet to start a game. You're facing the No. 5 team in the nation. And, oh yeah, they've outscored their first two opponents 139-7.

So, Texas coach Mack Brown, what do you tell redshirt freshman Major Applewhite before he starts Saturday at K-State?

"Go have fun," Brown said Monday. "He's not going to win or lose the game himself."

Texas (1-1) goes to Manhattan this weekend to play K-State (2-0) without the services of fifth-year senior quarterback Richard Walton, who was injured in the Longhorns' 49-31 loss to UCLA this past Saturday. Walton is expected to be out four to six weeks, missing at least four games.

Applewhite, 6-foot-1, 195 pounds, has played sparingly, completing five of seven passes for 59 yards.

Applewhite looked good late in the UCLA game, leading Texas to touchdowns on its final two drives. In the opener against New Mexico State, he completed two passes for 24 yards and led Texas to one touchdown in two drives.

But with the Wildcats looming, there probably was a better time for him to get the nod. K-State is coming off a 73-7 victory over Northern Illinois and a 66-0 pounding of Indiana State.

"I've never coached against a team that's averaging 69.5 points a game," Brown said, looking down a long sheet of imposing statistics.

"They've got a 10-game winning streak, just like UCLA had. They're No. 1 in the country in scoring. They had 59 points in the first half the other day. I don't care who you're playing, that's pretty good. They're No. 1 in the country in scoring defense. They're No. 1 in the country in scoring defense.

"That puts a lot of pressure on Major Applewhite going into his first start," Brown said.

"It's a great opportunity for him. He likes to play. He's real competitive. ... I thought Saturday when he went in — they still had all their starters in, their blitz, nothing changed — he looked like a starter."

CENTER

moved southward on the site, thereby opening up the space between it and Memorial Stadium.

"I think it's a much better solution," he said.

The Alumni Association has yet to begin a public fund-raising effort, although it is talking with donors looking to make major contributions. A public drive won't occur until ground is broken for the center.

Alumni Association president Amy Button Renz said most of the changes made to the design were a result of statewide and campus focus groups with alumni, faculty and students.

"This summer we attended over 30 Catbacker events and Alumni Association-sponsored events, and the response has just been overwhelming," Renz said.

When students came back to campus in August, they might have confused all the construction on Anderson Avenue with the initial phase of construction on the Alumni Center.

The sewer and utility construction, as part of the Anderson Avenue widening project, around the site of the future Alumni Center won't be done until next spring or summer.

Therefore, Renz said, any site preparation on the center could not begin until then.

Renz said the contractor will be chosen for the project in the next few weeks.

She said she also expects a committee to be formed of students, faculty and alumni to facilitate feedback on the project throughout the year.

"We'll continue to get feedback from a lot of campus groups to make sure it's conducive to their needs," Renz said.

SHELTER

Also, city ordinances require the shelter to hold stray dogs or cats for five days. When owners bring in animals for adoption, they effectively sign over ownership of their animals. These animals have no legal waiting period.

The result is dogs and cats brought in by owners often are exterminated first when space is needed, Schumacher said.

"We have had animals come in the front door and go out the back in a body bag in the same day. I've had to kill cats, bag them and clean the cages just to make room for the ones in the lobby," Schumacher said.

An ideal shelter, Schumacher said, would have a total of five separate rooms for adult dogs, adult cats, puppies, kittens and quarantined animals. The current shelter has two: One room is for all the dogs, and the other is for the cats.

A few additional cat cages also are located in the lobby.

Murphy said the Manhattan shelter, at an estimated 2,000 square feet, is dwarfed by the Salina shelter and the Lawrence facility. "What we need is about 8,000 square feet," Murphy said.

Rose Base, shelter coordinator for the Salina-Saline County Animal Shelter, said her building contains nearly 3,000 square feet, and construction is expected to be complete by next year on a new 9,000 square foot shelter. The shelter serves the city of Salina and Saline County.

Midge Grinstead, executive director of the Lawrence Humane Society Inc. Shelter, said the shelter is 10,150 square feet and officially serves the city of Lawrence and Douglas County.

Grinstead said her building is "absolutely at capacity" and also will have to put animals to sleep in the coming week to make room.

Of the three shelters, the Lawrence facility is the only shelter run by a private non-profit organization.

OPTIONS FOR THE FUTURE

Grinstead said the Manhattan shelter needs to establish a strong presence through television, radio and newspaper coverage while it waits for extra space. Getting more involved in the community can get more citizen participation and possibly raise adoption rates, she said.

"I think they need a bigger facility, and I think that they need to be in the news as much as possible. That's really helped us. We're calling the media constantly and saying, 'We've got something. Come to us,'" Grinstead said.

As for an expansion of the Manhattan shelter, Murphy said there is presently no status of which to speak.

The Animal Shelter Committee, Riley County-Manhattan Health Board and City Commission all are discussing options independently until the intergovernment meeting this month between Riley County and the commission on Sept. 24, he said.

"Expansion is being discussed, but no plans are being made to move forward," Murphy said.

Murphy said the City Commission is the most effective player in the effort. The shelter is on city-owned land, and Manhattan pays the majority of the costs.

"The city is really in the driver's seat here, and they need to offer a proposal and get commitments," Murphy said.

The original contract for the shelter was between the city and Riley County. Additional clients such as Pottawatomie County and the cities of Ogden, Kan., Leonardville, Kan., Riley, Kan., and Emmitt, Kan., came on later through verbal agreements, he said.

"The agreement needs to be rewritten to include these other entities and their share in the facility and operating costs," Murphy said.

Murphy said estimates for the cost of an expansion run between $650,000 and $950,000, depending on the materials used.

In the meantime, Murphy said new shelter supervisor Jody Kingery-Page and the staff are making better policies and procedures the top priority.

The shelter is in the process of setting up a computer system to replace paper files, he said. A new patrol employee also will be revising enforcement policies, Murphy said.

Although he said Kingery-Page has expressed strong interest in improving adoption rates, Murphy said adoption and public relations will not be the top priority until more resources become available.

"We're in kind of a holding pattern until the city decides what to do. Adoption is of interest to the Humane Society and to us and, quite frankly, I think we're doing a good job with the facilities we have available," Murphy said.

BY BRENT STOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Wildcat volleyball team learned a thing or two about itself this past weekend.

It learned it can compete with the best teams in the country. However, it also learned that it must play well every match, not just against the good opponents.

K-State opened with a win over Pittsburgh on Friday night in a three-game sweep, 15-3, 15-10 and 15-9.

Val Wieck led the way for the Wildcats with 11 kills and seven digs.

"We were able to turn balls in transition and score, and that was a major key in the match," Wildcat assistant coach Jeff Grove said. "And we served really tough."

Things were going as planned until the Cats ran into a roadblock Saturday afternoon against the Northwestern Wildcats.

The match went back and forth until Northwestern knocked off the Cats in the fifth and final game, 15-12.

"No one really wants to talk about it," junior Linsey Luther said. "It was kind of ugly. We should have won."

"WE WERE ABLE TO TURN BALLS IN TRANSITION AND SCORE, AND THAT WAS A MAJOR KEY IN THE MATCH."

— JEFF GROVE
K-STATE ASSISTANT COACH

Despite the loss, Dawn Cady and Kim Zschau provided a nice duo for the Cats. Cady finished the match with 13 kills and nine digs, while Zschau recorded 13 kills and 11 digs.

"We had trouble siding out," Grove said. "We had trouble getting consistent three-point passes to be able to run our entire offense."

However, the Cats responded well in their second match of the day against the 11th-ranked Florida Gators.

After dropping the first two games of the match, K-State battled back to win the third game 15-13. However, the Gators held on in game four, 15-10, to preserve the victory.

"We were siding out excellent," Luther said.

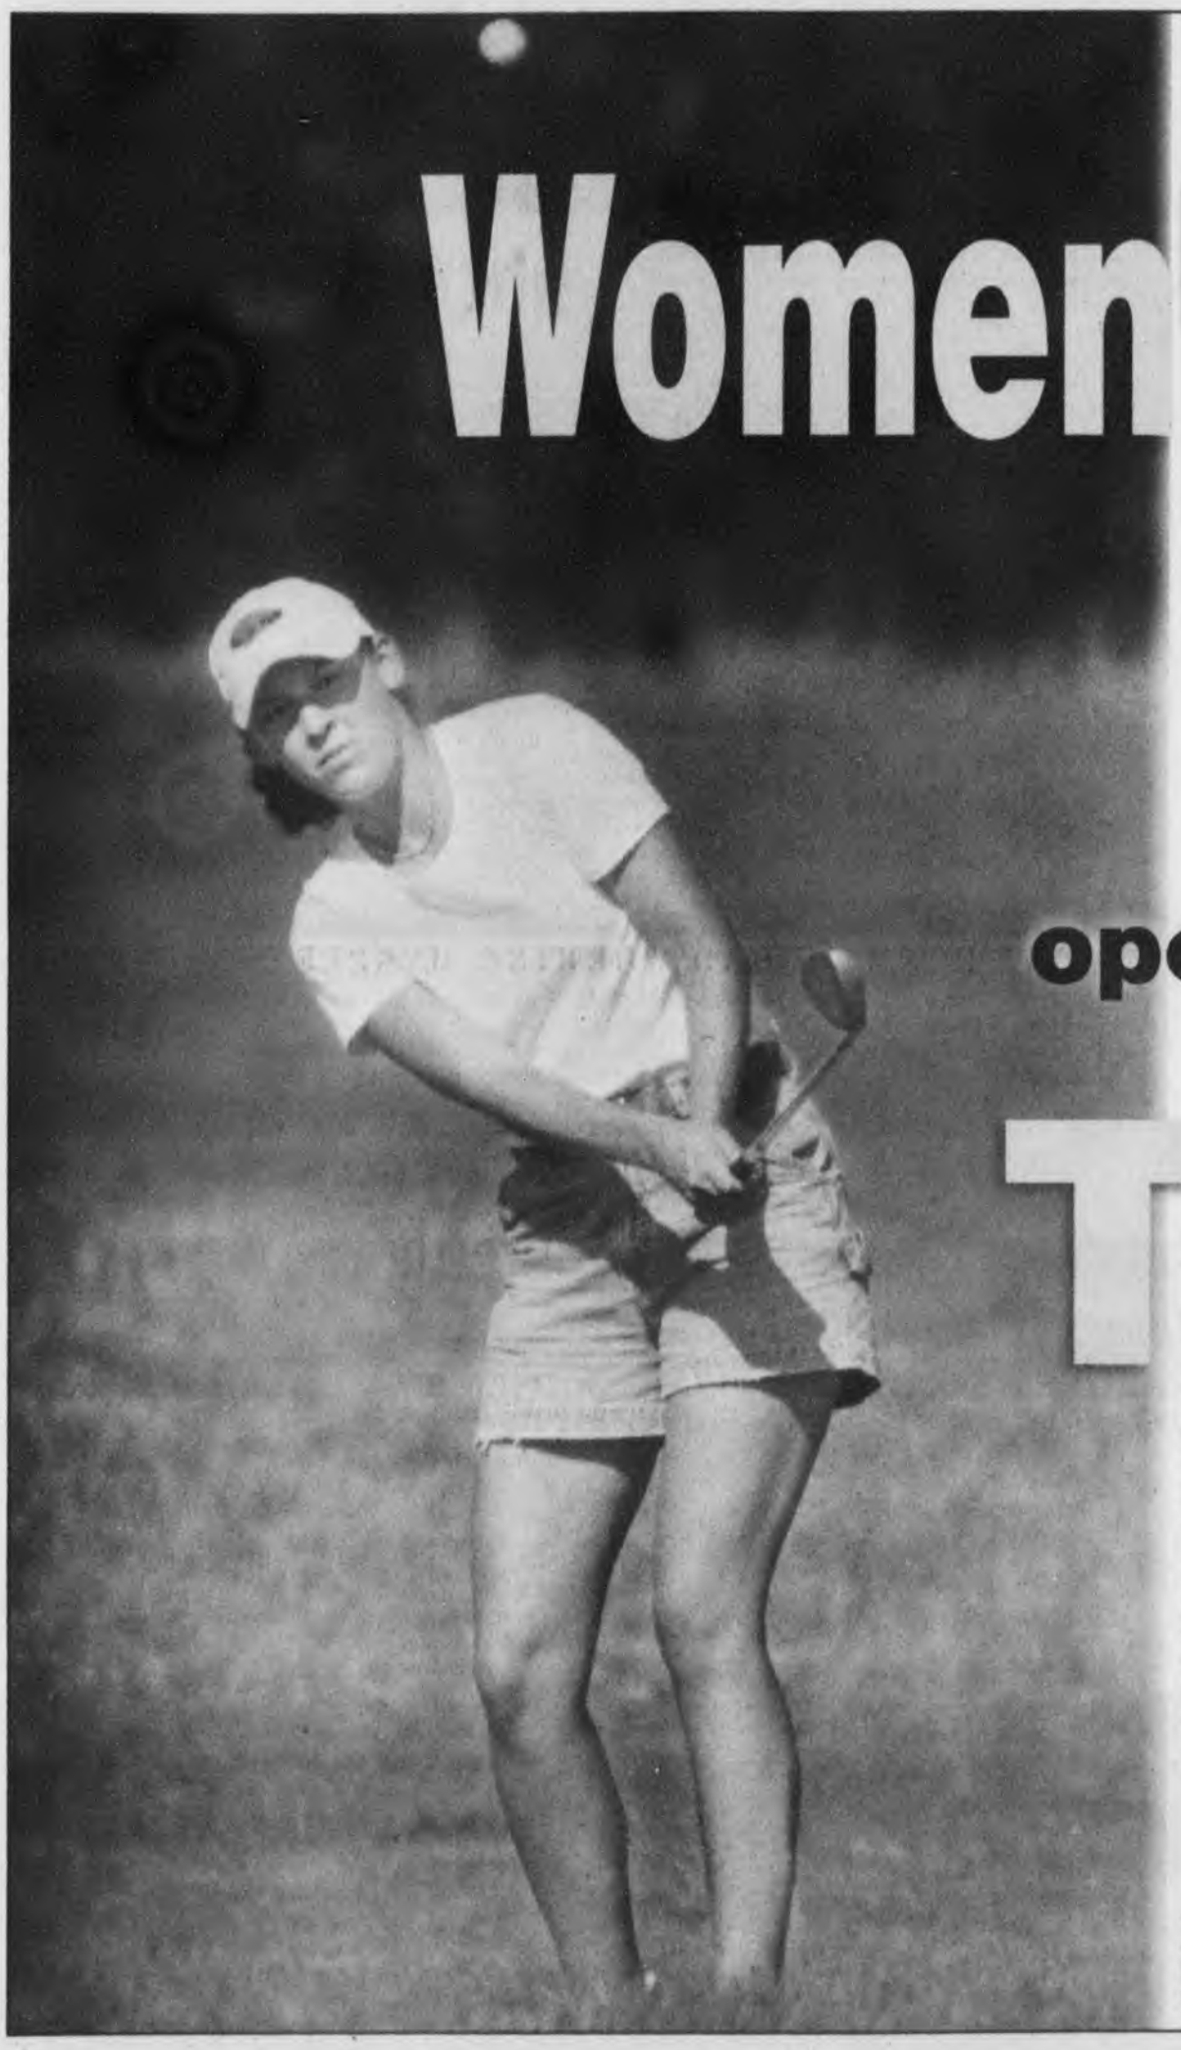
"All the games were extremely close, but they pulled it out."

It was a complete team effort for the Cats as four players posted double-figures in kills, led by Wieck's 17.

Doing the distributing for the Wildcat hitters was freshman setter Disney Bronnenberg, who finished with 59 assists.

"We saw a lot of bright spots out of that match," Grove said.

"I felt that if we could have taken game four, anything could have happened in game five."



Zschau and Wieck were voted to the all-tournament team along with Jessica Holloway from Northwestern and Jeni Jones and Heather Wright from Florida; the most valuable player from the tournament was Jenny Manz.

The Shockers are 2-6 on the season, with a 1-1 mark in Missouri Valley Conference play.

Over the weekend, the Shockers lost to Illinois State in three straight games Friday, then came back to beat Indiana State in four games on Saturday.

Tonight's match begins at 7 at Ahearn Field House.

Women's Golf

opened season monday

STORY BY JOSHUA KINDER

The K-State women's golf team opened its season Monday morning at the Chip'n Club Invite in Lincoln, Neb. The three-round tournament will conclude on Wednesday.

Senior Jane Yi led qualifying with 71-81-76 at Wildcat Creek last week and is representing the women as the No. 1 golfer in the women's first test of the fall season. Senior Mitzi Taylor and junior Carrie Chambers are rounding out the top three positions.

Traci Benninga, who walked on a year ago as a freshman, is joining freshman Lindsay Hammerschmidt for the final two positions. Kelli Johnston is playing on her own for the women in the individual spot.

Yi, Taylor and Chambers are the most experienced of the group and will be counted on by head coach Kristy Knight to lead this year.

"Jane played really well in the qualifying," Knight said.

"Mitzi had only one bad round. I feel confident with these two. They both had some some good nines and good shots. Jane, Mitzi and Carrie have the most experience and especially on this course (Firethorn). They've played in this invite last year. I expect for them to lead."

Knight said this tournament would benefit greatly the two most inexperienced golfers — Benninga and Hammerschmidt.

"This will be a great opportunity for Lindsay. She and Traci have a good opportunity to gain more experience for the rest of the year," Knight said.

One name absent from this squad is last year's fall-season leading scorer, Edie Murdoch. Murdoch led the women last fall as a freshman, but got injured in the spring and played only three rounds. She is rehabilitating after surgery she had last spring.

"We've decided to redshirt Edie this season," Knight said.

"It's in her best interest and the best thing for the team. She isn't back at 100 percent yet. She will be better next year and help the team more. Having her redshirt will give someone more experience this year who may not have a chance to travel. Edie will get her strength back and have a great season next year. She'll only be a sophomore."

Not all the invites will feature a team score and separate individual players' scores this season.

"We're lucky to take an individual to a tournament like Kelli Johnston," Knight said.

"I really think that Kelly, Traci and Lindsay will compete for the fifth spot this whole season. These are three girls who will gain a lot of valuable experience from this."

All of Manhattan, world stops for Martin Gramatica's history-making field goal

The earth stopped Saturday at 1:22 p.m. CDT.

Babies stopped crying. Bartenders stopped serving. K-State's marching band stopped playing. William Gramatica stopped cooking. Defensive coordinator Mike Stoops stopped talking. Coach Bill Snyder stopped coaching. Northern Illinois coach Joe Novak stopped worrying. Watches stopped ticking, the game clock showed all zeros and the Best Show In The Nation took a moment of intermission and witnessed the kick as Martin Gramatica signed his name in the NCAA record books.

The earth stopped rotating, the stars aligned for Gramatica, and with one great kick, his 65-yard field goal sailed through the uprights in the south end of KSU Stadium — four feet from hitting the crossbar — and he created history the way no other kicker has in the history of football.

Gramatica kicked the longest field goal in NCAA history without aid of a kicking tee, which was eliminated in 1989.

It was simply awesome.

Oh, you can flip the NCAA record book to Joe Williams of Wichita State, Steve Little of Arkansas or Russell Erxleben of Texas — kickers who each hit a 67-yarder, the longest field goal on record. They all used kicking tees.

Gramatica, the greatest kicker in the last 20 years, made a convincing argument on the field Saturday that he should be placed among the best ever to kick a field goal.

In the brief moment that forever changed the world's perspective of Gramatica, TV viewers and 41,967 fans held their breath. The only noise heard was that of a tumbling football, hanging, climbing, slicing through the stress-filled air with total confidence.

Standing behind his linemen, Gramatica tried but couldn't see the ball as it made its descend.

He knew it would reach, but was it straight? Or was it off like the 72-yarder he missed with the field-goal unit during practice three days ago? Yes, a witness told me he has hit a 75-yard field goal with just holder James Garcia accompanying him on the field.

But with the Huskies' stubborn special teams unit jumping and waving and hoping an index finger could redirect the kick, could he do it?

"I wish we could have backed up a little bit," quarterback Michael Bishop said. "I think it could have gone 70 yards."

But it didn't and couldn't. Time had no time for it. There were 2.6 seconds remaining in the first half with the ball resting on the K-State 48 yard-line when Snyder calmly called a timeout before third down. "Field goal," he said.

Gramatica continued to warm up behind K-State's bench and remained blind of the conditions that would dictate his march into history.

"I didn't even know how far it was until I looked on the field where I was standing," he'd say later.

A week after hitting a 55-yarder and missing a 45-yard attempt, nothing seemed to stop the 1997 Lou Groza award-winner from hitting his two previous kicks of 37 and 49 yards on Saturday and etching his name into history.

"He's a great kicker," Novak said. "Our job is to stop him."

They didn't.

What do you do when you witness history?

In a blink, KSU Stadium erupted, celebrated and applauded wildly. The scoreboard changed its score to 59-7, and the clock expired.

Gramatica stood there. His body turned weak, too weak to jump or even walk, and he was instantly pummeled by teammates whose bodies he usually climbed on after every made attempt. This was their playful revenge against the greatest kicker in K-State history.

A face mask struck Gramatica's nose as he laid motionless at the bottom of the pile, but he still smiled numbly at his feat. The fresh cut began to bleed, but he wouldn't feel it until hours after the game.

Snyder stood and clapped like a golf spectator watching Jack Nicholas tap in a three-foot putt then ducked away before he himself became victim of his player's celebration.

The K-State student section bowed to Gramatica as he concluded the longest, most dramatic, highest-scoring first half in school history.

The kick was simply awesome.

Ruskabank Rocks

BRANDON WHITE/ COLLEGIAN

BY SARAH FLORIER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For a little more than two years, Ruskabank, Manhattan's home-grown ska band, has been gradually gaining fans and recognition.

They've not only gained popularity in the K-State and Manhattan music scenes but also in the Lawrence and Kansas City areas.

The brainchild of New York native and keyboardist Donnyves Laroque, vocalist/guitarist Dave Spiker and drummer Dave Darby, Ruskabank started writing its ska jive in October 1995.

INTERESTED? Ruskabank's next performance is Sept. 22 at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon in Aggieville. You must be 21 to enter

Within a year, five more members were added: bassist Jayson Sullivan, alto saxophonist Chris Mayne, tenor saxophonist Ben Schierling, trumpet player Jamie Rogers and trombonist Dave Studnicka. Soon after, the eight members began earning their reputation as Manhattan's premiere party band and grabbed the attention of local-music followers.

Ruskabank members describe their music as "eclectic," aiming to make every song sound different. Because the members' musical backgrounds range from classical piano to jazz and punk to 70s rock, they said it has been relatively easy for them to achieve this goal.

When some band members are away from Manhattan, Ruskabank is able to continue to perform thanks to fill-in artists, such as Jeff Bilberry, who filled in for Darby last summer.

Over the past couple of years, Ruskabank has played in such venues as Gee Coffee in Olathe, the Granada in Lawrence, and most recently, SpiritFest over Labor Day weekend in Kansas City.

"It was the most fun I've had working myself to the point of nausea," Darby said, referring to the extreme heat of the Spiritfest weekend.

"The publicity we got for the show was awesome ,though," Laroque said. "Our name was all over K.C."

Ruskabank members admit, as much as they like to play the larger shows at venues in Kansas City, it's still the rock-out enthusiasm of the hometown crowds they crave.

"We want to keep attracting more people, not just to hear our music, but to help the music scene thrive here in Manhattan," Laroque said.

"We highly encourage audience participation at our shows. As long as the audience participates, we feel like we've done our job," Mayne said.

The band is in the process of releasing its first compact disc. No release date has been set for the compilation of old and new ska tunes.

One of the band's favorite new hits on the upcoming CD is a sing-a-long called "My Friends," inspired by and written for close friends of the band.

ON THE WEB Ruskabank has a World Wide Web site that you can view at www-personal.ksu.edu/~das3957

Fans awaiting Ruskabank's album release can listen to Ruskabank on such radio stations as K-State's own KSDB-FM 91.9 and Lawrence's KLZR-FM 105.9. The stations are some of the band's newest supporters — playing Ruskabank's music on air even though the band hasn't yet released an album.

The NABI Biomedical Center is the place to go for students who need cash fast and have plasma to spare.

Manager Leslie Bargen said the center opened in Manhattan largely because of K-State and the Fort Riley military base.

"We get a lot of regular college students and military people who donate as much as eight times a month, because it is harmless and instant cash," Bargen said.

The main question students ask is how much money they can make, she said.

"I donated plasma several times my freshman year," Carmen Keeten, senior in elementary education, said. "I could watch movies or study and make about $15 an hour doing it."

WANT TO DONATE?
First-time donors: call 776-9177 for appointments.
Return donors: walk-ins welcome on a first-come, first-serve basis.
NABI
1130 Garden Way

The center offers $100 for first-time donors and requires four donations within two weeks.

On return visits, donors receive $15 or more depending on how much they weigh. This varies because the center withdraws different amounts of plasma depending on the donor's weight.

Many students might be apprehensive about donating plasma, but Bargen said the procedure is harmless to the body. Donors are examined extensively before they are able to give plasma.

"We ask first-time donors to make an appointment and plan on two hours, and (for) return donors it is a first-come, first-serve basis," Bargen said.

Each new donor must visit the center's nurse for a physical, which consists of checking vital signs, a health-history questionnaire and a finger prick that determines if the donor's protein levels are high enough.

The nurse also checks to make sure donors are healthy, because plasma contains proteins, antibodies and immunoglobulins, which help fight diseases. Donors who are sick will only get sicker if they donate, as they will lose the ability to fight off disease.

"Plasma is made of 90 percent water, and since we leave the red blood cells, the plasma is replenished within 48 hours," Bargen said.

Because the plasma is replenished within 48 hours, it is safe for donors to donate twice a week, she said.

The plasma which the center receives is sold to other pharmaceutical companies that use the plasma for research, vaccines, burn victims, hemophiliacs and other medical uses. The plasma is not used for direct infusion.

"As long as you eat healthy and keep hydrated, donating plasma helps others and helps your pocketbook," Keeten said.

KSU Orchestra to play classical, pops music

Free performance features popular songs audience will recognize

BY KELLY LYNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Orchestra will perform a light classical/pops concert at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

The free performance will include "William Tell Overture" by Rossini, "When Summer Was Just Beginning," "Invitation to Dance" by Weber-Berlioz, a medley from "Titanic," a concert suite from "Dances with Wolves," and James Bond themes.

MORE INFO? The free performance is at 8:00 p.m. tonight in McCain Auditorium. Pieces include music from "Titanic", "Dances with Wolves" and "The Lone Ranger"

Reginald Pittman, director of opera theater, K-State music faculty member and tenor, will perform "The Three Tenors" arias.

"Since it is a pops concert, it's geared toward pop music, things people would know," said Segen Smith, third chair of the first violin section.

"The Three Tenors" arias are popular songs most recently performed by three operatic tenors, Luciano Pavarotti, Placido Domingo and Jose Carreras.

"Two of the songs are called Neopolitan songs, meaning they're pop songs of the early 20th century from Napels, Italy," Pittman said. "They're popular songs. The third one is from Spain."

Members of the audience will recognize the "William Tell Overture" as the theme to the popular TV series "The Lone Ranger."

"It's a wonderful piece by itself, even if you haven't heard of 'The Lone Ranger,'" conductor David Littrell said. "Some of the music has even been used in cartoons. People will recognize several parts."

The familiarity of pieces, such as the medley from "Titanic" and the "Dances with Wolves" piece, will be enjoyable to many students who have never experienced an orchestra performance before, Littrell said.

"It's fun doing the '007' piece," Littrell said. "People will enjoy it, because they will recognize the tunes."

K-State Orchestra performances last about an hour and a half and have drawn crowds of 500 to 900 people in the past.

The orchestra is the largest in its history with 84 members this year, Littrell said.

Nearly half the members are non-music majors. Auditions to join the K-State Orchestra take place at the beginning of the fall and spring semesters.

Manhattan settles EPA sewage-sludge complaint, plans fueling station

BY SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan will be doing a lot more for the environment this year.

As part of a settlement with the Environmental Protection Agency for improper sewage-sludge disposal, the city of Manhattan will not only reform its sludge practices but also will construct a public-access compressed natural-gas fueling station and add 10 CNG-powered vehicles to its fleet by July 1.

Last April, the EPA issued a complaint against the city for violations of the Clean Water Act. According to EPA documents, city reports between February 1993 and April 1996 showed inadequate records for pathogen, vector and metal levels in sewage sludge for 1993, 1994 and portions of 1995.

In addition, levels of sludge application to selected land in 1994, 1995 and 1996 exceeded agronomic rates.

Assistant City Manager Ron Fehr said city administrators were surprised when the EPA leveled the complaint along with a $137,000 fine.

When then-Utilities Director Bruce McCallum resigned, Fehr became the acting director, and the city discovered poor record-keeping and inadequate sludge space dating back possibly as far as 1993, he said.

"We tried to pick up the ball and get into line with EPA regulations. Basically, we found that we didn't have enough land to apply the sludge," Fehr said.

Pat Miller, the EPA's attorney on the Manhattan case, said the city offered to settle the complaint before they had officially filed an answer to the complaint. As a result, negotiations began quickly, and the current arrangement came about, she said.

Manhattan automatically paid $65,000 of the fine from utility reserves. For the remaining fine, the city agreed to build or help build a publicly accessible CNG fueling station at a minimum investment of $100,000 by July 1, said Assistant to the City Manager Diane Stoddard.

Miller said agreements involving a Supplementary Environmental Projector (SEP) are only possible in cases where the respondent has made a settlement instead of taking the complaint to court.

The rationale is that although the EPA can level fines, portions of the fine can be compromised if the respondent is willing to better the community to meet federal or state regulations in ways they normally wouldn't have pursued.

"It's not necessarily less punishment, but it's with the understanding that there can be a benefit from the settlement process," Miller said.

In addition, the city agreed to either purchase 10 new vehicles that run on CNG or modify existing vehicles to do so by the same date at a minimum cost of $35,000, Stoddard said.

The money is already included in the 1999 budget's utility reserves, she said. Another 10 CNG vehicles also will be added by July 2000 and 2001 under the agreement at $35,000 each year, Stoddard said.

Though the city had been considering the station since summer 1997 as part of a larger federal program called Clean Cities, that didn't disqualify it to substitute for part of the fine, Miller said.

"The fact that it may also fit into some other volunteer program doesn't preclude it from being considered as an SEP. This wasn't something they were obligated to do otherwise," Miller said.

Stoddard, who is also Clean Cities coordinator, said the settlement allows the city to use money for the program and settle the fine simultaneously.

"This provided an opportunity for us to keep these dollars that would have gone to the federal government," Stoddard said.

Negotiations also are in progress to purchase used gas-compressor equipment at a reduced cost from an undisclosed private firm, Stoddard said. The equipment would allow a car to fill up with CNG fuel in three to five minutes, instead of about eight hours with CNG under lower pressure, Stoddard said.

"Those type of fueling options aren't conducive to certain fueling needs. What we're waiting on is some information from the Kansas Department of Revenue," Stoddard said.

Current Kansas tax law states that alternative-fuel vehicle purchases receive a 50-percent tax credit until January and a 40-percent credit afterwards with a $2,500 cap on both cases. Stoddard said she is currently making inquiries about whether the same cap applies to the compressor equipment.

In the meantime, Miller said the EPA will be working with the Kansas Department of Health and Environment to make certain that Manhattan complies with the appropriate sludge regulations.

Under new Utilities Director Jack Messer, Fehr said the city is avoiding sludge application to select areas of the 104-acre stretch of agricultural land — known as the "old farm" — that was hardest hit from over-application.

The city also is renting 104 acres of private land to apply extra sludge, Fehr said.

"We have contracts in place that will get us by for the next year," Fehr said.

Fehr also said he hopes to bring issues such as more land or improved treatment methods before the City Commission within the next three months.

15-day strike ends at Northwest Airlines

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn. — Northwest Airlines began shuttling supplies and employees around on Monday as it got ready to resume passenger service for the first time since its pilots went on strike 2 1/2 weeks ago.

Northwest sent two cargo planes to Japan. The first passenger planes are scheduled to fly Wednesday, but it will be Monday before the airline is operating a full schedule of 1,700 daily flights.

Still, travel agents in Duluth, Minn., where the 15-day strike left the city without air service, were swamped with calls to confirm or book flights.

"The phones are driving us bonkers this morning," said Earl Rogers, owner of Duluth Travel, where more than 100 calls came in two hours.

Saturday, the 6,200-member Air Line Pilots Association ratified a new four-year contract that includes a 12-percent raise over the life of the contract, job protections, stock options and profit-sharing.

To appease customers, Northwest is offering bonus frequent-flier miles through the end of October. First- and business-class passengers will receive triple miles; coach passengers will receive double.

Northwest's labor worries are not over, however.

The airline still has open contracts with its five other unions, and its largest — the Machinists, with 27,000 members — has rejected a tentative agreement and asked federal mediators to start a 30-day countdown to a possible strike.

Sawyer wants smaller class sizes

BY JOHN HANNA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TECUMSEH, Kan. — Tom Sawyer said his goal as governor is to put millions of new dollars into public schools, much of it to decrease the average number of children in elementary classes.

Sawyer, a Democrat, outlined an initiative to decrease class sizes, then discussed other education issues Monday. He chose Tecumseh South Elementary School, outside Topeka, as the backdrop for a news conference. Sawyer's proposal for decreasing class sizes would cost $30 million.

He also said he believes the state should increase school districts' per-pupil budgets each year to keep up with inflation and increase the amount of money it spends on special-education programs.

Sawyer criticized Republican Gov. Bill Graves, who is seeking a second term, for missing opportunities created by the state's strong economy and the unexpected tax revenues it has generated.

Mike Matson, Graves' campaign spokesman, said the governor stands by his record, which includes support for substantial spending increases on public elementary, junior high and high schools.

Matson said Graves questioned whether the state could afford Sawyer's proposals and suggested that they take decision-making power away from local boards of education. Matson said Graves believes local school boards should decide how to spend the money they get from the state.

"There's two words that sum up what Tom Sawyer is talking about here — government mandate," Matson said. "Tom obviously wants to expand the government's reach all the way down to the community level."

Sawyer chose Tecumseh South Elementary School, just a few miles east of Topeka, for his news conference because its second- and third-grade classes have an average class size of 24 students.

Sawyer said he wants the state to use the promise of extra money to encourage school districts to have 17 or fewer students in each first through third grade classroom. School districts would receive extra funds for each student in a class of 17 or fewer.

He said reducing the size of classes in early grades is the best thing the state could do to help students learn. School districts would use the extra money to hire new teachers and add classroom space.

House Democrats introduced a bill during the Legislature to decrease class sizes, but with Republicans controlling both houses, it was not considered seriously. Sawyer, from Wichita, is House minority leader.

Matson questioned whether the state needs such a program. He said the average Kansas elementary school class has 17 students, giving Kansas one of the lowest teacher-to-student ratios in the nation.

"Tom wants to fix a problem that doesn't exist," Matson said.

Increasing the state's per-pupil budget for public schools also has been a longtime goal of House Democrats.

When the Legislature rewrote the state's school finance law in 1992, it set the base budget per pupil at $3,600. Since then, it has increased to $3,720.

Sawyer said the base budget should increase each year at the rate of inflation, nearly 2 percent in recent years. A 2-percent increase next year would be $74 per pupil, bringing the figure to $3,794.

He also said the state should spend more on special education programs. It now picks up about 85 percent of the excess costs associated with such programs, and Sawyer said the state should work to bring the figure to 95 percent.

After talking to reporters, Sawyer spoke to nearly 70 sixth-graders at Tecumseh South. They asked him more than two dozen questions on topics including abortion, gun control, drunken driving laws and capital punishment.

German chancellor gets boost from Bavaria

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BONN, Germany — For the first time since the election season kicked off last spring, Chancellor Helmut Kohl has an event he can celebrate. It couldn't come at a better time, just two weeks before national elections.

With as many as one-third of the voters still undecided nationwide, his Bavarian allies' victory Sunday could give him the jump-start he needs to counter recent momentum that had favored his challenger, Gerhard Schroeder.

"I am very happy that we have gotten this push," Kohl told reporters Monday. "The federal election is not decided yet, whatever the polls say."

After Kohl's party lost support in two bellwether state elections, the victory of the Kohl-allied Christian Social Union in Bavarian state elections gives the chancellor a big boost while he is heading into the final stretch of a so-far uneventful race.

No one expected anything but a victory for the CSU, which has ruled Bavaria alone since 1962 and has been part of every conservative national government since World War II.

The mere fact that Kohl's conservative allies did not lose support — maintaining the 53-percent majority they registered in 1994 — has been interpreted by some as a turnaround for Kohl.

The Social Democrats, on the other hand, dropped about one point to 29 percent in Bavaria.

The man whose political agility belies his hulking form recently has seemed strained and worn-out on the campaign trail, strengthening impressions that he's used up after 16 years in office.

Kohl has been playing catch-up in the polls since March, when Schroeder got his party's nod to take Kohl after winning elections in his home state, Lower Saxony.

The decisive victory gave Schroeder a boost that only began to narrow this summer. Few would be taking Kohl seriously now if it weren't for his come-from-behind victory in the last weeks of the 1994 campaign.

Kohl can take heart from a similar trend this year: The Social Democrats' lead has narrowed from 8 points in the spring to 3 points just 10 days ago.

Never before, however, has Kohl trailed so close to election day. His campaign theme — stability — has done little to generate a sense of excitement.

Kohl is focusing on significant diplomatic achievements, such as unifying Germany and setting the stage for the European single currency, and experience as a statesman in a time of global economic turmoil.

His challenger, Schroeder, said he acknowledges Kohl's achievements.

After the Bavaria vote, Kohl was at last in a position to fire back, warning Schroeder "to show a bit of modesty and wait for the voters to decide before putting up the party tent."

The Christian Democrats are "full of fighting spirit" for the final phase of his bid for an unprecedented fifth term, Kohl said.

Funds raised for International Student Center renovations

BY LYNETTE ABITZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The International Student Center soon will have more international connections.

A Taiwan wing and a Korean room are two of the additions and renovations to the center that tentatively will be completed by the end of September or early October.

"We were desperately in need of office space, and the amount of international students has grown," Donna Davis, center director said.

The original center, funded by K-State alumnus Edward J. King, was built in 1977. The current construction began in May and was funded by student groups, alumni and friends of K-State.

A committee was formed nearly three years ago to discuss building plans and fund raising. The committee gave student groups the opportunity to raise certain amounts of money and have a wing named after them. Two groups accomplished this goal.

Manhattan resident Joe Tiao raised the funds to build the center's new Taiwan wing. Tiao traveled to both the East and West coasts, as well as to Taiwan, and raised nearly $250,000. Tiao said about half the money came from Taiwanese K-State alumni, and the other half came from Taiwanese citizens.

Tiao said many Taiwanese students come to K-State, so he said he felt his contribution was important.

"My feeling is we should give something back to K-State," he said.

The Taiwan wing will contain office space and an area for students to fill out paperwork.

Old offices are being renovated to create the Korean room. Do Sup Chung, professor of biological and agricultural engineering, raised money through Korean alumni and friends to fund the renovation. Davis said one special fundraising event was the concert his niece, accomplished pianist Lucille Chung, presented in April 1996.

The Korean room will serve as a media room. It will have a television where students can watch events such as World Cup Soccer. Davis said that once the university receives cable, they will receive international news and events in the students' languages.

An office area for the International Student Coordinator and three computer terminals also will be in the room. The space could be used for small meetings.

Davis said beyond the current construction, the center is raising money for furniture for the new wing. The center is considering a Japanese garden for the courtyard and turning the current offices into a children's room.

Davis said even without the additions, K-State is a model to other universities without international student centers. She said it will be important for the center, with the new additions and coverage, to be creative with its programming in order to keep the momentum going.

"We want to attract more American students to get involved in our programs," she said.

"International experiences are an important component in the development of young leaders."

Pets provide happiness, lower stress for elderly

Vet students volunteer to select animals, take them to nursing homes.

BY JENNIFER WHITE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Veterinary medicine students not only try to make the lives of animals better, but some work to improve the lives of humans, too.

Each year since spring 1994, members of the American Animal Hospital Association student chapter have taken selected dogs and cats to Manhattan's four nursing homes. Each home is visited once a month for nearly an hour by students and animals. During this time, residents of the homes can pet and even hold the animals.

Third-year veterinary medicine student Joan Emery said her 3-year-old Siamese cat, Jerry, has been in the program for three years.

"He sits right on their lap, they can pet him and he just wants to curl up and go to sleep," Emery said.

"Their eyes just light up when they see him," Emery said.

"It makes me feel good, because some of them don't have family to visit them."

Mike Finn, second-year student in veterinary medicine, said he sees the visit as a way to give something back to the community.

"I think it is a valuable way to spend time," Finn said. "I had been a volunteer in the hospital as an undergraduate, and I think people we visit enjoy it."

Dr. Kathy Gaughan, instructor of clinical sciences, said all of the animals taken to the homes first are put through a temperament test.

"We want to see how much they really want to do this," Gaughan said. "We want to see how much they really enjoy being around people."

Gaughan said the program was brought to her attention by students who had seen a similar program at Washington State University. The Students for the Humane Animal Relationship Experience got the K-State students interested.

"I was very interested, so I started evaluating pets for them," Gaughan said.

Gaughan said there are many benefits for the residents from the pets; one is the health benefit a pet offers.

"There has been a lot of research that says being able to have a pet can reduce blood pressure and stress," Gaughan said. "They also invite conversation, when many people may not have family close by, the animals provide an avenue for visiting."

Gaughan said AAHA requests that students making the visits with animals be members of the organization, because during club meetings, they discuss issues that would be important for them to know during the visit.

"If they were not bringing their pet, they can go if they would like to see what it is all about," Gaughan said.

Mike Nawrocki, third-year student in veterinary medicine, said the visits with the animals give the residents a chance to visit with people outside the nursing home.

"Not only do they get to see the animal, but they get to speak to a young person about what it was like way back when," Nawrocki said.

Residence hall lacks computer lab; students inconvenienced

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For those who live in the residence halls, a computer lab in the hall is one of many conveniences. Putnam Hall, however, is the one residence hall on campus without that luxury.

Garland Lewis, director of information and technology for the Department of Housing and Dining Services, said Putnam has access to Van Zile Hall's computer lab through the tunnel that connects both Boyd Hall and Putnam to Van Zile.

"They (Putnam) basically have a lab, but it is not in the building. It is connected through the tunnel," Lewis said.

Van Zile's computer lab has five computers, two of which actually belong to Putnam.

"When space becomes available, the two computers will be moved into Putnam," Lewis said.

James Robertson, treasurer of Putnam Hall, said the two computers were donated by a resident's parents at the end of last semester. However, due to the performance level, the computers are not being used now.

"Housing and Dining is trying to get everyone (in the residence halls) Pentium computers. The ones that were donated were 486's, so it was a question of performance," he said.

Robertson also said it was unclear as to who owns the rights to the software stored on the computers.

Even though computers are accessible through the tunnel, John Klingele, president of Putnam Hall, said the main problem still is convenience.

"It is not a problem in the summer and spring to go to another computer lab on campus, but it is in the winter," Klingele said.

ON THE WEB Catch more information on the renovations at www.ksu.edu/intlstucenter/isc_pr.htm

In order for residents to use one of the computers in Van Zile, they must go to Van Zile's front desk and check out one with a two-hour time limit. If all computers are being used, the resident either must return later or can be put on a waiting list.

Ferdoas Afani, Strong Complex community assistant, said there are peak times when all of the computers are checked out, but usually only during meal times.

"It is very convenient having a lab in the building," she said. "Compared to living off campus and having to come back onto campus to use the lab, it's nice to walk down a flight of stairs."

■ OUR OPINION
The Collegian editorial board says students should take this opportunity to let their opinions be known. See Page 4.

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students with problems and concerns about K-State parking will have a chance to voice their opinions today.

The first of several forums on parking issues will take place from 2 to 6 p.m. today in McCain Auditorium.

The program is a joint venture between K-State and the city of Manhattan.

"We hired a consultant to study a transportation system in the city of Manhattan and on campus as well as the parking problem on campus," said John Lambert, director of public safety.

The purpose of the forum is to gather university-wide input and to receive ideas on what could improve parking and transportation.

"The consultant will be available to answer questions and will provide visuals in the McCain lobby of things such as pedestrian crossings and campus streets," said Rita Newell, assistant to the dean of the College of Human Ecology and chair of the University Transportation study committee.

Jointly, K-State and the city of Manhattan hired TranSystems, a consultant firm based out of Kansas City, to study several parking issues including a shuttle service, the need for a parking garage, campus roadways and campus pedestrian and bicyclist accommodations.

The University Transportation committee, a subcommittee of the Campus Development Committee, was formed last spring to represent the university's interests in the study.

"The study looks at transportation in all forms. Pedestrian, bicycles, vehicle, anything having to do with getting around on campus or in the city," Newell said.

Parking Services Director Darwin Abbott said the university had been trying for quite some time to do a study in conjunction with the city.

"There are a lot of people coming and going on campus and through the city so it made sense to work with them," Abbott said.

The study will be looking at two main solutions to the parking problem at K-State. The first is a parking garage, and the second is a shuttle system.

Abbott said three ideas are being researched for the shuttle-system solution. The first would have a shuttle rotate around lots already existing. The second would be the possibility of a park-and-ride shuttle from Bramlage Coliseum.

The last idea is to have a shuttle system run back and forth from apartment buildings with high concentrations of students in them. In this way, the city could work with the university.

"Freshmen in Goodnow, Marlatt and Derby could get on a bus to go to Wal-Mart or to Westloop. That would be a plus for them and good for the businesses," Abbott said.

Although there will be another forum on Nov. 16, Newell said she hopes many students will attend today's forum.

"Parking is an issue that everyone on campus is interested in. We want a lot of participation and a wide range of opinions and ideas," she said.

Abbott said students should attend and be a part of the decision-making process.

"We don't want the impact of a few making decisions for all," he said. "We would like to know what all the feelings are."

Data collected throughout the summer concerning the campus and the city will be presented at the forum. Questionnaires also will be distributed.

Commission awards grant of $100,000

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Moving day might not be too far ahead for the K-State Natural Gas Machinery Laboratory.

With the Manhattan City Commission's 5-0 vote at last night's City Commission meeting, the NGML, an institute in the K-State College of Engineering, will receive a $100,000 grant from the Manhattan Economic Development Fund to help the institute move its facilities from the Salina campus to a building to be constructed in Manhattan's industrial park.

The NGML, which tests and improves turbochargers for the natural gas industry, already had $800,000 of the estimated $900,000 necessary to build and equip the new building from the K-State Foundation and industrial clients, Kirby Chapman, NGML director said.

The $100,000 grant was originally intended as a loan by the Manhattan Economic Development Opportunity Fund Advisory Board. Mayor Steve Hall moved to amend the proposal to a grant, which passed 4-1.

"To me it's a question of let's vote on this on its merit. Is it worth $100,000, or is it not?" Hall said. City Manager Gary Greer also expressed concerns about the extra staff load necessary to keep track of the repayment.

Chapman said the new building, three to four times the size of the current one, would bring the equivalent of 26 full-time jobs to the community, practical experience to engineering and technology students and an estimated $362,000 to local businesses.

"Right now we're spending that money in Salina, and we'd be spending it here," Chapman said.

Now that funding is secured, Chapman said he

Clinton testimony could be released for public viewing

By DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The White House braced Tuesday for release of damaging new evidence as House Republicans pushed to make public a videotape of President Clinton's grand-jury testimony, said to show a chief executive uncomfortably answering pointed questions about sex.

Lawyers familiar with the testimony, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the videotape shows the president at times angry with graphic questioning from lawyers in Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's office. At one point, these sources said, Clinton accused prosecutors of criminalizing his private life.

CLINTON

These lawyers offered a description of the videotape as the White House labored to shore up Clinton's standing among congressional Democrats, and as Republicans brushed aside Democratic talk of a mere censure of the president.

Censure is "not an option that holds a lot of attraction," House Majority Leader Dick Armey of Texas told reporters, saying he had talked to rank-and-file GOP House members about the issue. "We believe that committing perjury and obstruction of justice, these are feats of enormous consequence."

Clinton testified at the White House by closed circuit before the grand jury Aug. 17. The videotape shows the president appearing to be caught off guard by questions a few times and struggling uncomfortably to answer, the lawyers said. Many times, when pressed to give more details, Clinton refers back to the legalistic statement his lawyers prepared to answer questions about the sexual nature of his relationship with former intern Monica Lewinsky.

REMEMBERING A FRIEND

Rex Caywood, Dan Will's stepfather, hugs members of the Riley County High School football team after Tuesday night's memorial service for Will in the school's gym. Will, a senior football player at RCHS, died Saturday after collapsing on the football field during a Friday night game.

Sophomore Jaime Bohnenblust (facing) comforts junior Josh Fleener after the memorial service for Dan Will Tuesday night in the Riley County High School gym.

With the stadium lights lit up and the scoreboard telling the score of Friday's football game against St. Mary's High School, flowers rest on a box at the 40-yard line in memory of Dan Will.

WILL

RILEY, Kan. — Lights illuminated the Riley County High School football field Tuesday night, but there was no game.

The scoreboard displayed a 6-0 tally in the home team's favor, but the stands were empty.

Dan Will was gone.

Hundreds of family, friends and football teammates gathered at the school Tuesday to remember Will, 17, with a memorial service. The co-captain of the team died Saturday after he collapsed at the school's Friday-night game against St. Mary's High School.

Students said Will, who died of a head injury at Topeka's Stormont Vail Regional Medical Center, would be remembered for his smile, sense of humor and caring heart. Senior David Brandenberg, one of many students who spoke at the service, said Will wouldn't be forgotten.

"The times I remember that we spent together were some of the best times of my life," he said. "I'll never forget them."

Rex Caywood, Will's stepfather, said he appreciated the support family members received from the community. Caywood said the family has received an outpouring of phone calls, visits and food since Will's death.

Students visited the family's home Monday, Caywood said, spending time with Will's parents and remembering his life.

"About 15 to 18 of his classmates and football team members came over. We went into Dan's bedroom and lounged around, just talking about Dan," he said. "What a wonderful experience. We got to know some of his classmates, and they're a bunch of wonderful kids."

The team's coaches have reviewed a video of the game that shows a near-perfect tackle and can't determine what caused Will's head trauma.

Though team members had discussed canceling the rest of the football season, Caywood said he hoped the athletes would play on. Caywood said Will would have wanted the season to continue.

"You have our family's full support to continue this season," he said. "I know there was

Rice artist does "tiny" business at State Fair

HUTCHINSON, Kan. — Looking for some luck? Stop by Robert Ito's booth at the Kansas State Fair.

Using a razor-edge pen, Ito, an artist, writes a person's name on a single grain of rice, which according to Japanese legend, will bring the bearer good luck and good fortune.

"We can get 10 or 11 letters on a grain of rice, and we can go as high as 15 or 18, but then the legibility starts to become a problem," Ito said. "It takes just a few minutes to do."

Ito and his partner, Steve Galloway of R&S Enterprises, are in a booth at the lower level of the fair grandstands. It's the first time they've attended the Kansas State Fair, and both said they were pleased with the volume of business.

Galloway said just about any message is fair game, as long as it can fit on a grain of rice.

"We do people's names, date of birth, whatever they want that we're able to fit," Galloway said.

He started the business after a friend of his in Japan sent him some gifts, including a grain of rice with his name on it. He thought the idea would catch on in the United States.

To complete a rice writing, Ito selects a single grain of long-grain rice, puts it beneath a magnifying lens and carefully inscribes the message using the special razor-edge pen.

When the ink dries, the grain of rice is put in a tiny glass bottle with a preservative agent. The bottle then is attached to a necklace, which the person wears for good luck. The highest-priced silver necklace sells for $14.95.

"It's an ancient art form that's been around for thousands of years," Galloway said.

Meanwhile, cool weather and clear skies over the weekend helped bring an estimated 52,014 people to the Kansas State Fair on Sunday.

That's 2,257 more than last year's first fair Sunday. The fair runs until Sunday.

Voice, data recorders give no clues to crash

HALIFAX, Nova Scotia — The cockpit voice recorder aboard Swissair Flight 111 stopped six minutes before its deadly crash — at the same time as the flight data recorder, crash investigators said Tuesday.

The finding provides further evidence the MD-11 suffered a crippling systems failure at that moment Sept. 2 shortly before it plunged into the North Atlantic off Nova Scotia, killing all 229 people on board.

Without the information, investigators will never learn what, if anything, the two pilots said to each other after their last communication with air-traffic controllers. That conversation ended with the pilots declaring an emergency because of smoke in the cockpit and saying they must land immediately.

The flight data recorder, which was recovered from the ocean floor several days before the cockpit voice recorder, is being examined by experts at a laboratory in Ottawa.

Canada's Transportation Safety Board members said the experts have confirmed a series of irregularities in systems on the plane prior to the last six minutes of flight.

"Developing a valid understanding of these anomalies will require extensive examination of wiring and aircraft components that have not yet been recovered from the wreckage," the board said.

It said the effort to recover wreckage from the ocean floor — a task assigned to the U.S. Navy salvage ship USS Grapple — could be critical to the investigation. Divers have located several large pieces of wreckage at a depth of about 180 feet.

Authorities say they won't begin hoisting large chunks of the plane until human remains are removed, and divers have been told it could take months to clear the crash site.

Both parties discuss Presidential penalty

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr spent at least $4.4 million investigating the alleged cover-up of the Monica Lewinsky affair — a figure that became an instant political weapon in the debate over penalizing President Clinton.

Sen. Frank Murkowski, R-Alaska, introduced a Senate resolution Tuesday that would demand Clinton repay the cost of the investigation for misleading the country since January.

"President Clinton has pursued a strategy of deceiving the American people and Congress, and he purposely delayed and impeded the independent counsel investigation," Murkowski said. "Equity demands that the costs of the delays should be borne by the president and not the taxpayers."

Many Democrats already are advocating a penalty less than impeachment for Clinton, such as a censure and reimbursement arrangement similar to the reprimand and penalty that House Speaker Newt Gingrich got in a 1996 ethics case.

The White House left open the possibility Tuesday that Clinton might accept a penalty.

Albanian president surrenders 2 tanks

TIRANA, Albania — Under strong international pressure, former President Sali Berisha surrendered two tanks posted outside his headquarters Tuesday after the government threatened force if his followers did not give up their weapons.

Following two days of rioting, Prime Minister Fatos Nano promised to guarantee Berisha's safety and opened the door to a political settlement of the crisis threatening this former communist capital.

But Nano warned the government would not "wait endlessly" for Berisha's supporters to hand over their weapons. Late Tuesday, the government declared the unrest an "attempted coup" and ordered a criminal investigation of Berisha and his followers.

The two tanks were surrendered after a day of intense, behind-the-scenes negotiations, including a meeting late Tuesday between Berisha and international officials, who accused his followers of trying to topple the government.

After that session, Berisha conferred briefly with his followers, and moments later the tanks were driven away from his Democratic Party headquarters and handed over to police.

Some of Berisha's followers could be seen unloading their rifles, but it was unclear whether they were surrendering them to police. Witnesses said it appeared some of Berisha's followers inside the headquarters were still armed.

Twins receive respect on Japanese holiday

NAGOYA, Japan — At 106, Japan's oldest twins are still going strong — spending time together watching sumo wrestling or charming audiences on TV talk shows.

The sisters — Kin and Gin, or "Gold"and "Silver" — received 106 tulip bulbs from a flower association to honor them on Tuesday's national Respect for the Aged Day.

"It's nice to be able to live this long, but the truth is that ... nobody up there wants to invite me, so I can't go," Gin Kanie on Monday told Associated Press Television with a wide, wrinkled grin.

The sharp-witted female twins who live in the central Japanese city of Nagoya, 190 miles west of Tokyo, are often cited as examples of graceful aging in a society that reveres the elderly.

Graceful aging is becoming more important these days in Japan.

On Monday, the government announced that more than 20 million Japanese are 65 or older — a record high. One-quarter of the population will be elderly by 2015, according to government projections.

Kin has five surviving children and lives with her youngest son Yukio, 67, and his family. She has 11 grandchildren and five great-grandchildren.

Gin, who lives 20 minutes away, has four daughters and lives with her youngest daughter Mineyo, 74. She has four grandchildren and three great-grandchildren.

"That's what I think at least. I don't know what this person has to say," Kin said, turning to Gin.

"Hmm, that's a tough question," her sister said.

The two looked at each other and burst out laughing.

Gwendolyn Mink speaks about welfare and women's equality Tuesday night in Forum Hall. Mink's lecture, "Feminists and Poor Single Mothers: Work, Welfare and Women's Equality," was the first Dorothy L. Thompson Civil Rights Lecture of the semester. Mink is a professor of politics at the University of California at Santa Cruz.

EXAMINING WELFARE

Speaker says women treated unfairly under current welfare system

BY JAIMIE HARTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Personal Responsibility Act was the most sweeping assault on women's rights this century, said Gwendolyn Mink, guest speaker for the Dorothy L. Thompson Civil Rights Lecture Series, on Tuesday night.

The Welfare Reform Act, passed by Congress two years ago, has poor unmarried women seeking below-poverty level positions, Mink said.

The poverty-level line is based upon a family of three, which makes approximately $13,000 in income per year.

"Welfare has not been very nice to women or has honored choices women need to consider and make," Mink said.

Under the new act, the legislature gave the state governments the ability to choose which mothers would receive welfare. With non-married women, the government can ask the mother personal, detailed questions about the conception of her child.

Mink said the core message the government is sending out is that single mothers should get married.

"With a two-parent, heterosexual, nuclear family on welfare, one of the parents can stay at home and take care of the children. With a one-parent situation, the parent must leave home and work," Mink said.

Mink said the Personal Responsibility Act violates the fundamental rights of women, because they are not given the freedom of vocation or sexual privacy.

"The mothers may not want to identify the father because they are afraid of abuse, they are married to someone else, or maybe don't want to subject the father to the punitive-reform act. They might just want emotional support rather than a dollar amount from the government," Mink said.

Feminist voices were few in the fight against the new welfare system, but feminists can play an important role in the reformation of this act, Mink said.

"Sometimes by their silence, sometimes by their deeds, feminists actually collaborated with the punitive welfare system," Mink said.

Because the welfare act did not directly affect middle-class feminists, they did not raise their voices as they might have for abortion rights.

There should be an arena of female sisterhood between feminists and single, poor working mothers, Mink said.

In order to reform this act, Mink said this should be considered a civil-rights issue as well as a survival issue. She suggested a caregivers' income would be a good alternative in reforming this act.

"It would restore the mothers' constitutional rights if they are not married with children and are poor," Mink said.

Cheryl Strecker, co-chair of the Dorothy L. Thompson Civil Rights Lectures committee, said one of the reasons the committee brought Mink to K-State was because of her expertise on the areas of race, gender and class.

"She was willing to be a catalyst in encouraging discussion of the issue and raising awareness of the issue," Strecker said.

Mink has published and lectured widely on the subject of race, class and gender dynamics of law, social policy and social movements. She wrote the book "Welfare's End," which analyzes the nation's 30-year campaign for women's rights.

She has also written "The Wages of Motherhood: Inequality in the Welfare State, 1917-1942," which won the Victoria Schuck Book Award from the American Political Science Association for the best book on women and politics. Mink is also the co-editor of "The Reader's Companion to U.S. Women's History," which is the first general-reference work of its kind.

"WELFARE HAS NOT BEEN VERY NICE TO WOMEN OR HAS HONORED CHOICES WOMEN NEED TO CONSIDER AND MAKE."

Construction could start by November and be complete by next summer.

"I'd like to be integrated with the city. It makes a statement about city support," Chapman said.

The commission also unanimously passed two resolutions to allow application for Transportation Equity Act for the 21st Century funds.

The first application is by the city administration to apply for $1.5 million of TEA-21 funds to improve the "Wal-Mart ditch" running parallel to Ft. Riley Boulevard from the extension of Poyntz Avenue to McCall Road. The city would pay the remaining $500,000 of construction costs.

The second approved resolution allows K-State to apply for TEA-21 funding to continue the bicycle/pedestrian path from the intersection of Claflin Road and North Manhattan Avenue.

Commissioners Bruce Snead and Karen McCulloh said they believe pathways allow citizens without cars more mobility.

"We've spent a lot of money on a bike path, and we've got to find a way to get people from point A to point B without a car if they choose," McCulloh said.

SERVICE

discussion about canceling the season. Our family doesn't want you to do that, and you know Dan wouldn't want that."

Doctors located recipients for many of Will's organs, and Caywood said he hoped the donation would keep his stepson's memory alive.

"I hope today there are many people who have a better quality of life. Dan's presence is still with us and will live on for a very long time," he said.

The family has also established a scholarship fund in Will's name at the school.

Other speakers shared memories of times they spent with Will and read poetry written by Will and by students after his death. Many anecdotes and pieces of Will's poetry evoked laughter from the crowd, while other speakers drew tears and silence.

Senior Shanna Williams led a prayer to conclude the service.

"We ask you to take Dan under your wings and care for him as he cared for others," she prayed. "We are all grateful to have met such a wonderful person and know how lucky you are to have him up in heaven with you."

When the service concluded, Principal Jim Hardy told the audience they were free to leave during the recessional, "Fly Away," by Celine Dion. No one moved except Caywood and members of the team, who shared a hug in front of the podium.

Jon McGraw, an RCHS graduate and member of the K-State football team, said sadness shouldn't overshadow the joy that Will brought to many lives in the area.

"There shouldn't be any heavy hearts," he said.

"If there are any tears to cry, they should be tears of joy. We're here to celebrate his life."

Senior Tyler Steiner said Will wouldn't be forgotten.

"For me, my classmates, my team and all of these guys — Dan, we're going to miss you and we love you," he said.

Funeral services for Will are at 2 p.m. today at Manhattan's St. Thomas More Catholic Church.

"IF THERE ARE ANY TEARS TO CRY, THEY SHOULD BE TEARS OF JOY."

— JON MCGRAW, K-STATE FOOTBALL PLAYER

Will is the third Kansas high schooler to die of football-related injuries this season. In August, two Wichita-area students died from heat exhaustion during preseason practice.

Input vital in solving transportation problem

Today from 2 to 6 p.m. in McCain Auditorium; the University Transportation study committee will be offering students the opportunity to voice their opinions on parking and transportation.

The study committee is part of a larger focus group consisting of representatives from Parking Services and the city of Manhattan. The two have hired a consulting firm to address transportation issues in and around the area. K-State is just one part of an area-wide initiative intent upon easing the troubles of the city.

Nevertheless, it is important for them to get student input. Parking Services takes frequent criticism for the transportation problem at K-State. Hiring a consultant is a big step toward a comprehensive transportation plan, but in order for the consultant to provide an effective solution, they need to hear the voice of the constituent student body.

That's why we encourage students to attend the forum today. The fact that it will last for four hours makes it possible for any student to attend when they have space within the 2 to 6 p.m. time frame. McCain is voluminous enough to accommodate large numbers of people, the process is simple, and it would accomplish quite a bit.

Not going to the forum means you have missed out on your opportunity to voice your opinion. Although there will be another forum Nov. 16, students should realize the next one might not be quite as open, this might be our only real chance to speak our minds, and we need to speak when our opinion on parking is fresh. If the opportunity is thrown away, it means students have no reason to complain if the transportation solution isn't tailored to their needs.

When the KSU Alumni Association began planning the alumni center building, they organized a number of student and alumni forums to decide the building's character. Recently, because of criticism from outside sources that the building did not serve as a gateway and that it didn't address the campus, the Alumni Association sent the design back to the drawing board. The project is based entirely on private funds, so there is no need for the Alumni Association to take public interest into mind for the design. Nevertheless, they volunteered to let the public have a voice, resulting in the center still evolving in plan and form.

Students can have the same kind of influence on the transportation project. It can be tailored to fit our needs, but we must let those involved know what we want so they can make the proper recommendations.

Several issues are at hand. The city and campus are looking to make the environment more bicyclist-friendly, and they need to know how to do that. Planners are looking at the possibility of incorporating a bus system into campus, but issues such as yearly cost, where and how to do pickups and how to tie it into the city's own comprehensive transportation plan are questions continuing to loom over the project.

Parking Services also has entertained the idea of adding a parking structure in the lots south of the K-Stat Student Union to provide more stalls, but this was rejected by the student body at the time it went up for vote.

This is why every student should seize the opportunity to give feedback: We should because we'll possibly foot the bill.

Nobody will disagree that parking on this campus is a problem. It is one far more pressing than a stadium expansion issue, because while the effects of a small stadium are that people have a hard time buying tickets as long as the team remains good, the effects of an unclear transportation plan are accidents, injuries, inconvenience and tickets.

In order for the issue to be solved, we will need to pay. There is not enough money available in the City/University Tax Fund to finance the project to the point where it will be completed. Curing the parking ills at K-State is something that must be done completely, otherwise, there's no use in bothering.

We need to make the right decision, then we need to support it. Just as students before us gave money for the library and union expansion, it is now our time to step up to the plate and give something to the university that will live on for the next 40 to 50 years or beyond.

Parking could be our legacy.

ARCHITECTURE UNDER THE OKLAHOMA SUN

Trip to Bartlesville, Okla. turns out very disappointing for architecture students

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

Tucked into the tree-soaked hills of northeast Oklahoma, Bartlesville is the sort of city you mention in conversation and are met with blank stares.

And that's entirely inappropriate for any true Midwestern student passionate about architecture, or just life, on these endless plains. Go, dog, go to Bartlesville.

Having read my architectural history books like a good student should, I had visions of Frank Lloyd Wright's Price Tower and Bruce Goff's Price House opening up on the horizon like some Emerald City beckoning my worship.

Wandering into town with no agenda other than searching out these architectural fantasies, my companions and I headed to the official tourist center. A woman there told us the city was growing by several thousand people a year. When I asked if those were people moving out of Tulsa, Okla., or actually residents finding jobs in the city, the conversation fell silent. In the tourist industry, you can't win them all.

She then told us about Price Tower, the Community Center (which is a Wright design completed after his death, thereby not quite making the cut for most critics), and the conglomeration of seriously over-scaled, New York-style skyscrapers downtown that make up the world headquarters of the Phillips Petroleum Company. OK, OK, get to the Goff, I thought.

Responding in the robotic way tourist officials often do, she informed us the addresses of the two Goff homes in town were unavailable to the public. Apparently, the owners don't want anyone looking at their homes.

There was a Goff-designed church, however, across the street we could look at from our car but couldn't enter. Well, I thought, even the rude French let us Yanks into Notre Dame and Ronchamp , and we really wanted to see Price House, begun in 1956, the epitome of organic architecture playing with geometric form.

Frustrated but not hopeless, we signed the guestbook and darted back into the Oklahoma heat in search of Price Tower.

By the time we parked our over-heated car in front of Price Tower, we were exhausted; it was unfortunate to see the tower in the same state. Next to Wright's Barnsdall House, which is slowly decaying to ruin in Los Angeles, Price Tower must be one of the worst-maintained Wright structures in the country.

The soaring tower is easily recognized as a Wright work — all juxtaposed, angular planes jutting into space and terminating at an elegant roof garden. The geometric copper panels that define the building's edges give it a sense of volume. The stacked-pancake appearance of the floors contrasts brilliantly with the strict verticality of the tower.

So the stucco was peeling away, the lawn and surrounding hardscape were left for dead, and the building leaves no obvious traces of being appreciated by the community that claims to love it. It's still standing, and in 110-degree heat, that was fine with us.

Leaving the tower and taking one last glance at the tree growing on its roof, we made a few obligatory circles through downtown before heading off into the residential heart of the city. What else to do but ignore the tourist official's wishes and attempt to find the Goff homes on our own? When you are young and crazy and drunk on architecture, that's a perfectly sane prospect.

Did I mention that Bartlesville has a lot of residential neighborhoods? We drove around for half an hour — me being an ask-no-questions man — before we stopped and asked questions. Our first victim was a security guard we caught inspecting a warehouse gate.

"Excuse me, could you tell us where we might find some interesting homes designed by Bruce Goff?

They would probably be in a nice part of town, but they are sort of unconventional looking."

His reply, "Well, look south of downtown. There's some old houses down there that are nice. It's kind of fancy."

We ask, "Do you know the Bruce Goff homes?"

Again, his reply, "No. Sorry. Can I interest you in the truth — the true word according to Reverend Falwell? I've found peace."

I made the last part up for effect, but the point was this guy had never laid eyes on these homes. His idea of nice homes were turn-of-the-century quasi-Victorians in various states of decay.

After exhausting another hour searching on our own, we gave up and went for a drink at the most logical Bartlesville hangout: Sonic.

We were delirious from the heat and our fruitless effort. In a sort of hellishly self-defeating manner, we asked our car-hop if she knew where we could find some "crazy homes." Her reply, as if sensing the insanity of her interrogator and the demented melancholy of his sidekicks, was as marvelously ludicrous as "there's a house down in Colonial Estates with vines on the walls. I don't know, I live on the east side of town."

Yes, I thought, as I blew bubbles into my cherry limeade. Yes, Colonial Estates. That is what Wright and Goff worked toward their whole lives — to design a house in Colonial Estates in bleeping Bartlesville, Okla., on land that was stolen from the Cherokee.

Yes, I kept thinking. Yes. I repeated while I drifted beyond the endless supply of Phillips 66 gas stations, heading north into Kaw territory, wondering just precisely when a person's sense of discovery and environmental awareness was vacuum-sucked into a styrofoam cup and served to tourists at a Sonic.

Students pick up big financial ticket when adopting pets

VIEWPOINT

JASON RUCKER

As the semester rolls on, many students have begun to miss their friends and families back home. For many of us, family included some members that were hairier than others. I'm not talking about your uncle Jim, who used to wrestle you to the floor and tickle you till you wet your pants.

I'm talking about the family members who got so excited to see you, they wagged their tails and peed on the floor (OK, so uncle Jim had a few too many and did that once, too). You miss your dogs, cats, birds and whatever other critters you may have had in your menagerie.

This may have led you to consider adopting a new pet. Perhaps you've never had a pet but always wanted one for a companion, a protector or to pick up dates (people always want to pet the puppy). Whatever your reason, this time around, you will be footing the bills, and you have a lot to consider before you run to the pet store. Until you have a pet of your own, you don't realize how expensive they can be.

Prices to keep dogs and cats are pretty similar, and as these are the most popular pets. I'll use a puppy for this example.

Kick-starting the cash vacuum is the price of purchasing or adopting a puppy. Depending on where you get the animal, this cost will vary from around $40 for a lovable mutt from a shelter to hundreds or thousands of dollars for a pure breed.

Once you have pup in hand, you have to take it to the vet for its first set of shots at 6-8 weeks of age. The checkup, de-worming and series of shots, with subsequent boosters for one year, will run you about $80. Protecting it from heartworms for a year will cost another $100.

Too many people think vaccinations are something they can get when they have the money or when it's convenient. This is far from the truth.

For the safety of your pet, the public and your own family, it is imperative you keep your animals current on all vaccinations.

You're already racking up quite a bill, and you don't have room or money for more puppies, so you will have to have your pet spayed or neutered for $60-$90, depending on the procedure and the dog's size. Many people with female dogs think they can control them and avoid a pregnancy, but you can't keep track of everyone's dogs. Owners of males often see it as someone else's problem if their dogs get other dogs pregnant. This is awfully irresponsible, and your dog will be much less aggressive if you have him neutered.

Now you have the basic medical needs out of the way. However, no one can predict an emergency or sickness. The medical costs associated with these often will increase with the size of the dog, as medications are dosed based on the animal's weight. So, if your pocket book says Chihuahua, don't let your ego adopt a Saint Bernard.

You also will have to have your dog licensed in Manhattan, which costs around $6. There may well be a monthly fee for pets in your house or apartment, if they are allowed at all. And of course, you will have to feed it, which again, will vary in cost depending on the dog's size but averages about $250 a year. There will be unforeseen costs, too.

All in all, you are looking at a financial obligation of at least $600 for the first year with your new puppy, but money won't be the only thing you have to give up. Pets, especially young ones, require a lot of attention, so you'll have to give up a lot of time to properly socialize your pet. If you neglect your pet, I can promise you it will be a nightmare to deal with, tearing up your house and potentially your body.

While having a pet is a lot of fun, your parents were right, it is also a lot of responsibility. So before you make the decision to buy a pet, be sure you can afford to make the sacrifices necessary to keep you both happy.

K-State students give back to community as volunteer Big Brothers, Big Sisters

By SHANDA PARKER
Kansas State Collegian

Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc. gives K-State students the opportunity to make a difference and get away from their studies.

"It gives me a big sense of satisfaction knowing that I am helping someone," Stacey Ellebrecht, junior in animal science, said. Ellebrecht is one of 72 K-State students who volunteer for Big Brothers-Big Sisters.

Big Brothers-Big Sisters gives children and adults in the community the opportunity to develop a one-on-one relationship with each other. Adult volunteers spend a few hours each week doing activities with their Little Brother or Little Sister.

Ellebrecht said she always had enjoyed giving children a chance to interact with animals. One way of doing that is spending time with her Little Sister, Sarah, and teaching her how to ride Delta.

"It's a chance that she may have never had," Ellebrecht said.

Ellebrecht and Sarah often spend their time enjoying each other's company, eating ice cream and learning how to ride the horse, she said.

"I was matched with Sarah because of both of our love for animals," Ellebrecht said.

Big Brothers-Big Sisters hopes to pair 130 children with volunteers. There are still 35 boys and 22 girls waiting to be paired.

"We always need more volunteers, especially Big Brothers," Tami Carolan, executive director of Big Brothers-Big Sisters, said.

The process includes an application, letters of reference, a background check, meeting with a case manager and then pairing. Each pairing is assigned a case manager who works with the children, their parents and the volunteer.

There is a one-month waiting period after applying.

"That is the hardest part — waiting," Ellebrecht said.

Two new programs Big Brothers-Big Sisters is working on are a mentoring program at school for volunteers to meet one to two hours a week with a child after school. Another program new this year has married couples volunteering their time being paired with a child.

All the programs benefit the children and the volunteers.

"The child has this new exciting person they want to impress," Carolan said.

Kevin Brighton, first-year veterinary student, decided to get involved with the program to give himself a chance to become active in the community while attending school.

"I didn't think I would have time, but it gets me away and forces me to think about something else," Brighton said.

Brighton was paired up with his Little Brother, Charlie, a month ago, and they have been competitive ever since.

Brighton and Charlie usually talk on the phone once a week to plan what activity they would like to do for the next week.

Usually a competition is scheduled in either video games, swimming or air hockey.

"I can beat him anytime," Charlie said.

"Yeah, whatever," Brighton said.

Brighton and Charlie have a new idea for the program — a "Big Brothers-Big Sisters Olympics." The event would include javelin throwing, bicycle riding and swimming.

Brighton said he enjoys the time he spends with Charlie and planned to continue volunteering.

"It's worthwhile. I wish I would have started earlier," Brighton said.

'Be Your Best' offers 2nd chance for women to become Girl Scouts

By DESIREE LAMBERSON
Kansas State Collegian

For several women, some of their fondest childhood memories are from their days as a Girl Scout. The patches, the cookies and the friendships forever will be looked back upon as some of their best days.

However, some women never got the chance to become a Girl Scout. Now they have a second chance, not only to relive the memories or join a troop for the very first time, but also to show younger girls how to "Be Your Best."

"Be Your Best is an opportunity for girls who cannot be involved in a traditional Girl Scout troop for one reason or another," Erica Ferris, graduate student in theater, said.

The program was initially created by women's studies students to address the problems of young girls in the community. Be Your Best is designed for girls in grades 4-8 who mainly come from low-income families and cannot afford the money obligations of a traditional troop.

INTERESTED?
Women interested in volunteering for Be Your Best can attend a meeting at 3:30 p.m. Thursday in Union 203.

With the aid of college volunteers, the group participates in activities such as roller-skating, swimming and art projects with the younger girls.

"It's about being there and being a mentor," Ferris said.

"These girls are in a situation where their parents work, and who may not be presented with a positive role model that's a woman," she said.

Former women's studies instructor Marlene Howell said she encouraged her students to participate in the program.

"It's a chance to see up close and personal how some stresses modify life, especially the general effect on women as they're developing," she said. "It's a reality check."

However, Ferris said that she is still looking for volunteers to serve as such role models.

"We are looking for college-aged women because they are a greatly respected authority, but they're still younger, so the girls really listen to what we have to say, and they take it as gospel," Ferris said.

Ferris said that she is looking for any women who are majoring in women's studies, psychology or education who would like to volunteer for approximately five hours per week.

Anyone who is interested in volunteering may attend a meeting at 3:30 p.m. Thursday in Union 203.

Ferris said she encouraged anyone who was interested to volunteer.

"You may be 22, but it's still fun to go out and roller-skate," she said.

Meet your dean

Architecture dean raising money to renovate Seaton Hall

Amanda Ewing
Kansas State Collegian

Editor's Note: This is the third story in the Collegian's "Meet your Dean" series.

Growing up on a cotton farm near Petersburg, Texas, Dennis Law didn't envision a future life as an architect.

"I thought I'd be a farmer," Law said. "That's what everyone did."

Law, dean of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, majored in agriculture at Texas Tech University. He received his bachelor's degree in parks and recreation administration.

While at Texas Tech, Law took design classes. This encouraged him to take the Texas state board exam in landscape architecture. He passed and was a landscape architect before he had a college degree.

Law came to K-State in 1974 as a graduate student in landscape architecture. Before 1974, he worked at Astro World, a Six Flags' facility in Houston, Texas, where he was director of landscape architecture. Three years ago, Law became dean of the college.

LAW

As dean, Law said he is responsible for many facets of the college, including raising money for the planned renovations of Seaton Hall.

"We are in the process of getting new designs for the renovation of the building, deciding what to put in now and how to raise the rest of the money," Law said.

Law said he also raises money for scholarships and is responsible for raising nearly half of the college's budget.

"We only get 53 percent of our budget from tuition and state appropriations," Law said. "I have to find the rest of it."

In addition to his responsibilities as dean, Law teaches a drawing class of nearly 40 students. He also teaches country-dance lessons for Union Program Council.

Law is a resource for students. Alissa Ward, freshman in architecture, said she has never met with Law, but she is aware of his role.

"I think someone should meet with him if they're having problems, need suggestions or if it has something to do with teachers or professors," Ward said.

Law said he welcomes students' visits, but they should take questions to their department head or Associate Dean Ray Weisenburger first.

"Students are welcome to come in," Law said. "A lot come in because they feel they have a friendship with me. I like that."

Donna Potts, assistant professor of English, spent a year in Ireland teaching two lectures after receiving a Fulbright lecturing award. Potts became interested in the literature of Ireland in 1994 while attending an Irish Studies Conference, in Omaha, Neb.

JEFF COOPER/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Professor hopes to travel to Ireland again

BY DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Irish shopkeepers know what their customers want.

Just don't ask for something they don't have, because the inevitable answer will be, "You don't need that."

Rude? Hardly. This is the same shopkeeper who gave a child a birthday card signed "Your Irish granny."

Richard Potts was the 6-year-old recipient of that birthday card. He lived in Ireland while his mother, Donna Potts, taught two required lectures after receiving a Fulbright lecturing award.

Potts, assistant professor of English, arrived in Ireland on Aug. 15, 1997, and spent a year there with her family. Her husband, who teaches math at K-State, was on sabbatical and went with her along with their son and daughter, barely one year old.

Potts said she became interested in Irish literature in 1994 when she attended her first Irish Studies Conference in Omaha, Neb. She listened to poet Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill read in Irish-Gaelic and was fascinated by how beautiful the translations were.

Three years later, Potts was on her way to Galway, Ireland.

"Galway had a lot of support for the arts. Its population is always increasing, but it still has the feel of a small town," Potts said.

But the town's size was not the problem — it was the size of the classroom. Potts went from teaching 30 K-State students to lecturing in front of 300 Irish students. This required her to prepare at least eight pages of lecture material, and to accept the fact that Irish students were less likely to visit during office hours.

"It was very unusual. I'm used to getting responses from students. I was lucky if I got a one-word response, but it wasn't as discouraging as I thought it would be. They always seemed attentive," Potts said.

When Potts wasn't lecturing in Modern American Drama or Representations of Ireland, she found time to travel to 32 counties within Ireland.

Among these was Dublin, where she did both research and sightseeing. Potts also flew to Finland for five days.

"It was extremely organized, high-tech and very dry. The people were friendly but more reserved than the Irish," Potts said.

That is the difference Potts admired. She said the atmosphere in Ireland was more relaxed. There were fewer rules and regulations. Shops didn't have hours posted on their doors — they could open whenever they wanted.

"I guess I always knew it had that reputation. Most people think the Irish are lazy and sit around and drink. They don't. They have less paperwork and value communication more. I think they have their priorities straight," Potts said.

She said she wished she could have brought the more relaxed Irish attitude back to the United States. But Gregory Eiselein, assistant professor and director of graduate studies in English, said she is the embodiment of this attitude.

"Donna doesn't have that zany rushing, she's more sane, but she is tremendously energetic in terms of her research and her intellect," Eiselein said.

Carol Franko, assistant professor of English, said she agreed with Eiselein.

"Donna has an intense interest in language. It fits in with her interest in Irish literature, which has wonderful stories and wonderful use of language. She is a poet and a critic," Franko said.

Potts will be teaching a 20th century Irish literature course next year for graduate students. She said she wants to return with them to Ireland.

"I think I wished to come back," Potts said, referring to her wish when kissing the Blarney stone in Ireland.

Full-time workers need $8.11 an hour, group's study says

BY ERIN JESCHKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A local Manhattan group said it hopes to help wage-earners in Manhattan receive better pay, as well as help the city reduce the need for public-assistance programs.

The Manhattan Alliance for Peace and Justice conducted a living-wage survey in the Manhattan area. In order to provide for all the necessities to live in the Manhattan area, the study said residents need to earn $8.11 an hour on a full-time job. The group said it hopes to work with city officials to incorporate some form of a living-wage policy into its policies.

MAPJ Chair Mary Jo Murphy said the group has spoken with the Manhattan City Commission and is building a coalition in an attempt to include a living-wage provision in city policy.

"We're hoping to work with the commission to draw up the policy and get it inserted into the economic development policy that goes to the vote in November," Murphy said.

She said the details of the provision have not yet been set. Commissioners are still unclear about the report's statistical accuracy and if a living-wage policy can be incorporated into Manhattan's codes.

Commissioner Ed Klimek said he is interested in the idea, but he wanted more information about how to define the living wage as well as verification of the actual number.

"I haven't heard that clearly defined yet, and that's important as well," Klimek said.

Klimek said even though the living-wage policy could be viable, it needs to be applied properly as part of the city's economic-development policy.

Klimek said the first step is to send the information to the Manhattan Economic Development and Opportunity Fund Advisory Board, which screens businesses interested in coming to Manhattan and receiving public assistance. The MEDOFAB group would look at how the living wage fits into the city's policies.

"That would really be a process where we would look at that in the MEDOFAB Committee, and then it would go on to the City Commission," Klimek said. "We need to have some more time to work on this as well before we come out with any sort of policy."

Commissioner Karen McCulloh said she also likes the idea of the living wage but said the MAPJ needs to develop a clear policy idea for the city to consider.

"I think that they need to come up with some good wording on that, because just to say we're not going to have any company come to town that doesn't pay a living wage doesn't leave us any maneuvering room," McCulloh said.

McCulloh said the real benefit from a living-wage provision would be a decrease in the need for public-assistance funding. She said the city paid more than $200,000 last year to support public-assistance programs.

Programs that receive funds include the Flint Hills Legal Centers, Big Brothers-Big Sisters of Manhattan, Inc. and the Riley County Manhattan Health Department.

If living wage was adopted, more people would be financially stable, which might lead to less dependency on these organizations and less money into the programs, McCulloh said.

"It's difficult to determine how the programs would be affected, but you would think that [a living wage] would help decrease public assistance needs," Ron Fehr, social services adviser for the city, said.

Most companies have an entry-level training wage, but the pay does go up to a living wage after some time, Fehr said.

The business applicants who have shown an interest in coming to Manhattan so far have had a living wage at that level for the most part, he said.

"Sure it would help. So far, no other entities have done any research besides MEDOFAB and the MAPJ, but all applications have exceeded the dollar amount," Fehr said.

"WE NEED TO HAVE SOME MORE TIME TO WORK ON THIS AS WELL BEFORE WE COME OUT WITH ANY SORT OF POLICY."

Finding cheap rates crucial for travelers

BY AMY MILLER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students booking hotel rooms have options for finding cheap rates.

Brooke VanDegrift, of Creative Travel Inc., said although hotels typically don't have student discounts, some have lower prices for certain days of the week.

"It all depends on the hotel," VanDegrift said. "Sometimes it's cheaper on weekends, if you stay over Friday and Saturday, and higher Sunday through Thursday. Sometimes, it's the opposite."

Brenda Simons, of AAA Kansas, said she thought weekend stays had better rates, but AAA offered lodging discounts for any day.

"Normally people like to be a AAA member," Simons said, "so they can get the discount regardless of when they stay."

She said a basic one-year AAA membership, which costs $40 plus a one-time $15 enrollment fee, offers significant hotel discounts. They vary from 10 percent off at Econo Lodge to 25 percent off at Hilton hotels.

She also said members get free tour books that list hotels offering AAA discounts.

Beth Dickinson, senior in elementary education, said cost was a concern when she and the rest of Kappa Alpha Theta sorority's senior class planned a trip to New Orleans, and using a travel agency helped.

Dickinson said the women needed seven rooms, and they didn't think they could find a reasonable rate on their own, so they contacted Regency Travel Agency in Omaha, Neb.

"The rooms would have been $230 a night," she said, "but we actually paid $330 per person for airfare and lodging for three nights."

VanDegrift said if customers want an economic hotel, she usually offers them rooms at a Best Western or Days Inn, if available. But people have different ideas of a good deal, so if they want to spend a little more, she'll find other accommodations.

"I get an idea of what they want to pay," she said.

Internet users have access to online sites showing hotel discounts.

Best Fares Magazine Online, at www.bestfares.com, features hotel specials for the next weekend, listed by state. The site also has links to information on major hotels, bed and breakfasts and international hotels.

HotelNet, at www.aladv.com/hotelnet/index.htm, lists by state hotels that offer a discount of at least 5 percent when customers mention the site. It also has coupons to be printed and used at certain hotels.

Director witnesses many changes in 21 years

MOEDER

BY BRIAN R. CRISP
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After 26 years in Manhattan, if anyone is qualified to talk about change at K-State, it's Larry Moeder.

Moeder, director of student financial aid and interim director of admissions, said he has been working for the Office of Student Financial Assistance 21 years, serving seven of those as director.

Moeder said he has seen a lot of change in the Financial Aid Office since he began as a work study student.

"The amount of funds has dramatically increased. In those days, the amount of financial aid was maybe $20 million compared $65-$70 million today. Also, it's a lot easier to administer," Moeder said. "Ten to 15 years ago, students waited for three months to get their money because of regulations."

Moeder said he also has seen changes in the entire campus.

"The attitudes of students is much better. Students play a major role in deciding policy now," Moeder said. "Before it was like a large bureaucracy, and the attitudes went with it. Today, it's more of a community atmosphere."

Moeder has served as president of the Kansas Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators and also is interim director of admissions.

Moeder said he enjoys the challenge of his job.

"I like working with students who have very difficult financial situations and being able to solve those problems," he said.

Seventy percent of students at K-State receive some sort of financial aid amounting to $70 million in grants, loans or work studies, Moeder said.

"My job is to make it possible for students to attend K-State through financial aid and scholarships," Moeder said.

Lisa Yi, senior-associate director of student financial assistance, said her first impression of K-State was through Moeder.

"He was very helpful and a great example of an administrator," Yi said.

"Larry encourages all of us to get involved. He is involved on all levels of the profession."

Moeder said volunteer work is important for the university.

"When you volunteer on the state and national level, you gain a lot more than you give and can bring your knowledge back to better serve the university," he said.

Moeder was one of six recipients of the leadership award announced July 17 at the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators national conference in Chicago.

The award will be presented during the annual meeting of the Rocky Mountain Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators, which takes place Oct. 25-28.

"Larry has been recognized for excellence both nationally and in the K-State community, so this award comes as no surprise to me," Pat Bosco, dean of institutional advancement, said.

The award is given to one individual in each of the six regions who, according to the guidelines, "Exhibits high integrity and character, who has shown creative leadership and has inspired and encouraged others to actively participate in professional development, and who has made outstanding contributions at the regional and state levels over a sustained period of time."

K-State officials postpone search for new director of admissions

BY BRIAN R. CRISP
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After months of searching for a new director of admissions, university officials now say the search has been postponed.

The position of admissions director has been vacant for the past 13 months since Richard Elkins retired last year.

Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco said there have been two national searches since Elkins retired, but both searches were unsuccessful.

Director of Student Financial Assistance Larry Moeder has been filling the position since last fall.

With qualified admissions on the horizon, the absence of a director might sound like a serious problem for admissions, but Bosco said that's not the case.

"This has only been possible because of a good, strong staff," Bosco said.

Bosco said the search committee is suspended at this time, probably until the spring.

Bosco said the search has been suspended to test the joint venture between the admissions and financial aid departments, which could be permanent.

Moeder said he enjoys the joint venture, which lets him see the university from a different perspective.

He said the joint venture allows the Office of Student Financial Assistance to reach students earlier.

"New students are applying for admissions and trying to pay for it at the same time, plus most new students want to talk to financial aid anyway," Moeder said.

By combining their work with the admissions office, he said financial-aid administrators can reach students as early as high school.

"I think we're able to better serve the students up front," Moeder said.

Williams benefactor of massive Texas offensive line

WILLIAMS

BY JON BALMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When someone coined the phrase "Everything's bigger in Texas," there's a good chance he was a football fan. And when the University of Texas invades Manhattan this Saturday, K-State will see a colossal example in the Longhorns' offensive line.

Although running back Ricky Williams has been collecting most of the media attention this season in his quest for the Heisman trophy, the offensive line in front of him deserves praise as well.

Averaging a hefty 310 pounds, the Longhorns' offensive front has contributed to a Texas attack that ranks 23rd nationally in rushing (215.5 yards per game) and leads the Big 12 Conference with 12 rushing touchdowns this season.

With a powerful line paving the way for Williams, Coach Bill Snyder said the Longhorns' offense would pose a serious challenge for the Wildcats.

"Their offensive line is probably as big as there is in the country," Snyder said.

"They're all pretty good sized and athletic. Their tight end looks small in comparison, and he's large as it is."

If the Longhorns' line can be penetrated by the K-State defense, a second challenge looms in Williams, who has compiled 375 yards and nine touchdowns in Texas' first two games.

At 6 feet and 225 pounds, Williams' success on the field stems from his large quantity of offensive weapons. With multiple ways to attack the defense, Snyder said Williams is a worthy Heisman candidate.

"He's got the whole package," Snyder said. "Ricky is the kind of guy who can bounce to the outside, or he can put his pads down and run over top of you.

"He can ward off tackles, he possesses excellent lower-body strength, and he's excellent at the stiff arm. He's elusive and powerful," Snyder said.

The combination of Williams' multiple talents and the offensive line's size should provide the season's first major battle for the Wildcat defense.

After keeping Indiana State and Northern Illinois to a combined seven points and 169 yards on the ground, the Lynch Mob will face not only a talented runner, but a strong offensive line as well.

"They're going to be a big challenge for us," defensive end Joe Bob Clements said. "You look across the board, and they're all 300 pounds plus. We haven't gone against an offensive line this size in a long time."

While Clements and the front four will concentrate on penetrating the Longhorn line and disrupting their blocking, the linebackers will face the task of containing Williams.

Already considered one of the best groups in the NCAA, K-State's linebacking crew will have the chance to prove its merit against one of the best runners in the nation. When asked about the matchup, linebacker Mark Simoneau said the group welcomed the challenge.

"Ricky provides a lot of their offense, and that's the guy we're going to really have to focus on," Simoneau said. "If we want to stop him, we have to get a lot of guys to the football. That's going to be a key for us."

With the first Big 12 opponent of the year coming to Wagner Field Saturday, K-State players said the level of excitement on the practice field was rising with each day.

While emotion will play heavily into the Cats' game plan, Clements said focus is crucial if the defense hopes to corral the Texas tag-team of Ricky Williams and the Longhorn offensive line.

"Primarily, we're focused on stopping Ricky," Clements said.

"If they're gonna beat us, he's gonna have to get yards on us."

K-STATE NETTERS POUND SHOCKERS

BY BRENT STOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The goal for the K-State volleyball team Tuesday night was to come out and hammer the opponent.

And that's exactly what they did to the Wichita State Shockers, 15-8, 15-6 and 15-2.

The third game was especially impressive as the Cats jumped out 12-0 before Wichita State finally got on the scoreboard.

"The exciting thing for us is that we turned some plays that we might not have turned before," Wildcat assistant coach Suzie Wiemers said.

"We've got a little more poise and a little more composure," Wiemers said.

After suffering its first two losses of the season during the weekend in Florida, the Cats bounced back in a big way against the Shockers.

"We distributed the ball really well," senior Kim Zschau said. "That opened up a lot of sets for me and Val (Wieck)."

The match was really no contest, right from the get-go. For the match, the Cats out-hit the Shockers .402 to .101. K-State more than doubled Wichita State's kill output, 64-30.

Zschau led the way for K-State with 22 kills and 15 digs.

"She's starting to figure out that she's just got to bang it all the time," Wiemers said. "She hit some heavy balls tonight."

Zschau also had 36 attacks to become K-State's all-time total attacks leader, surpassing the record held by Yolanda Young.

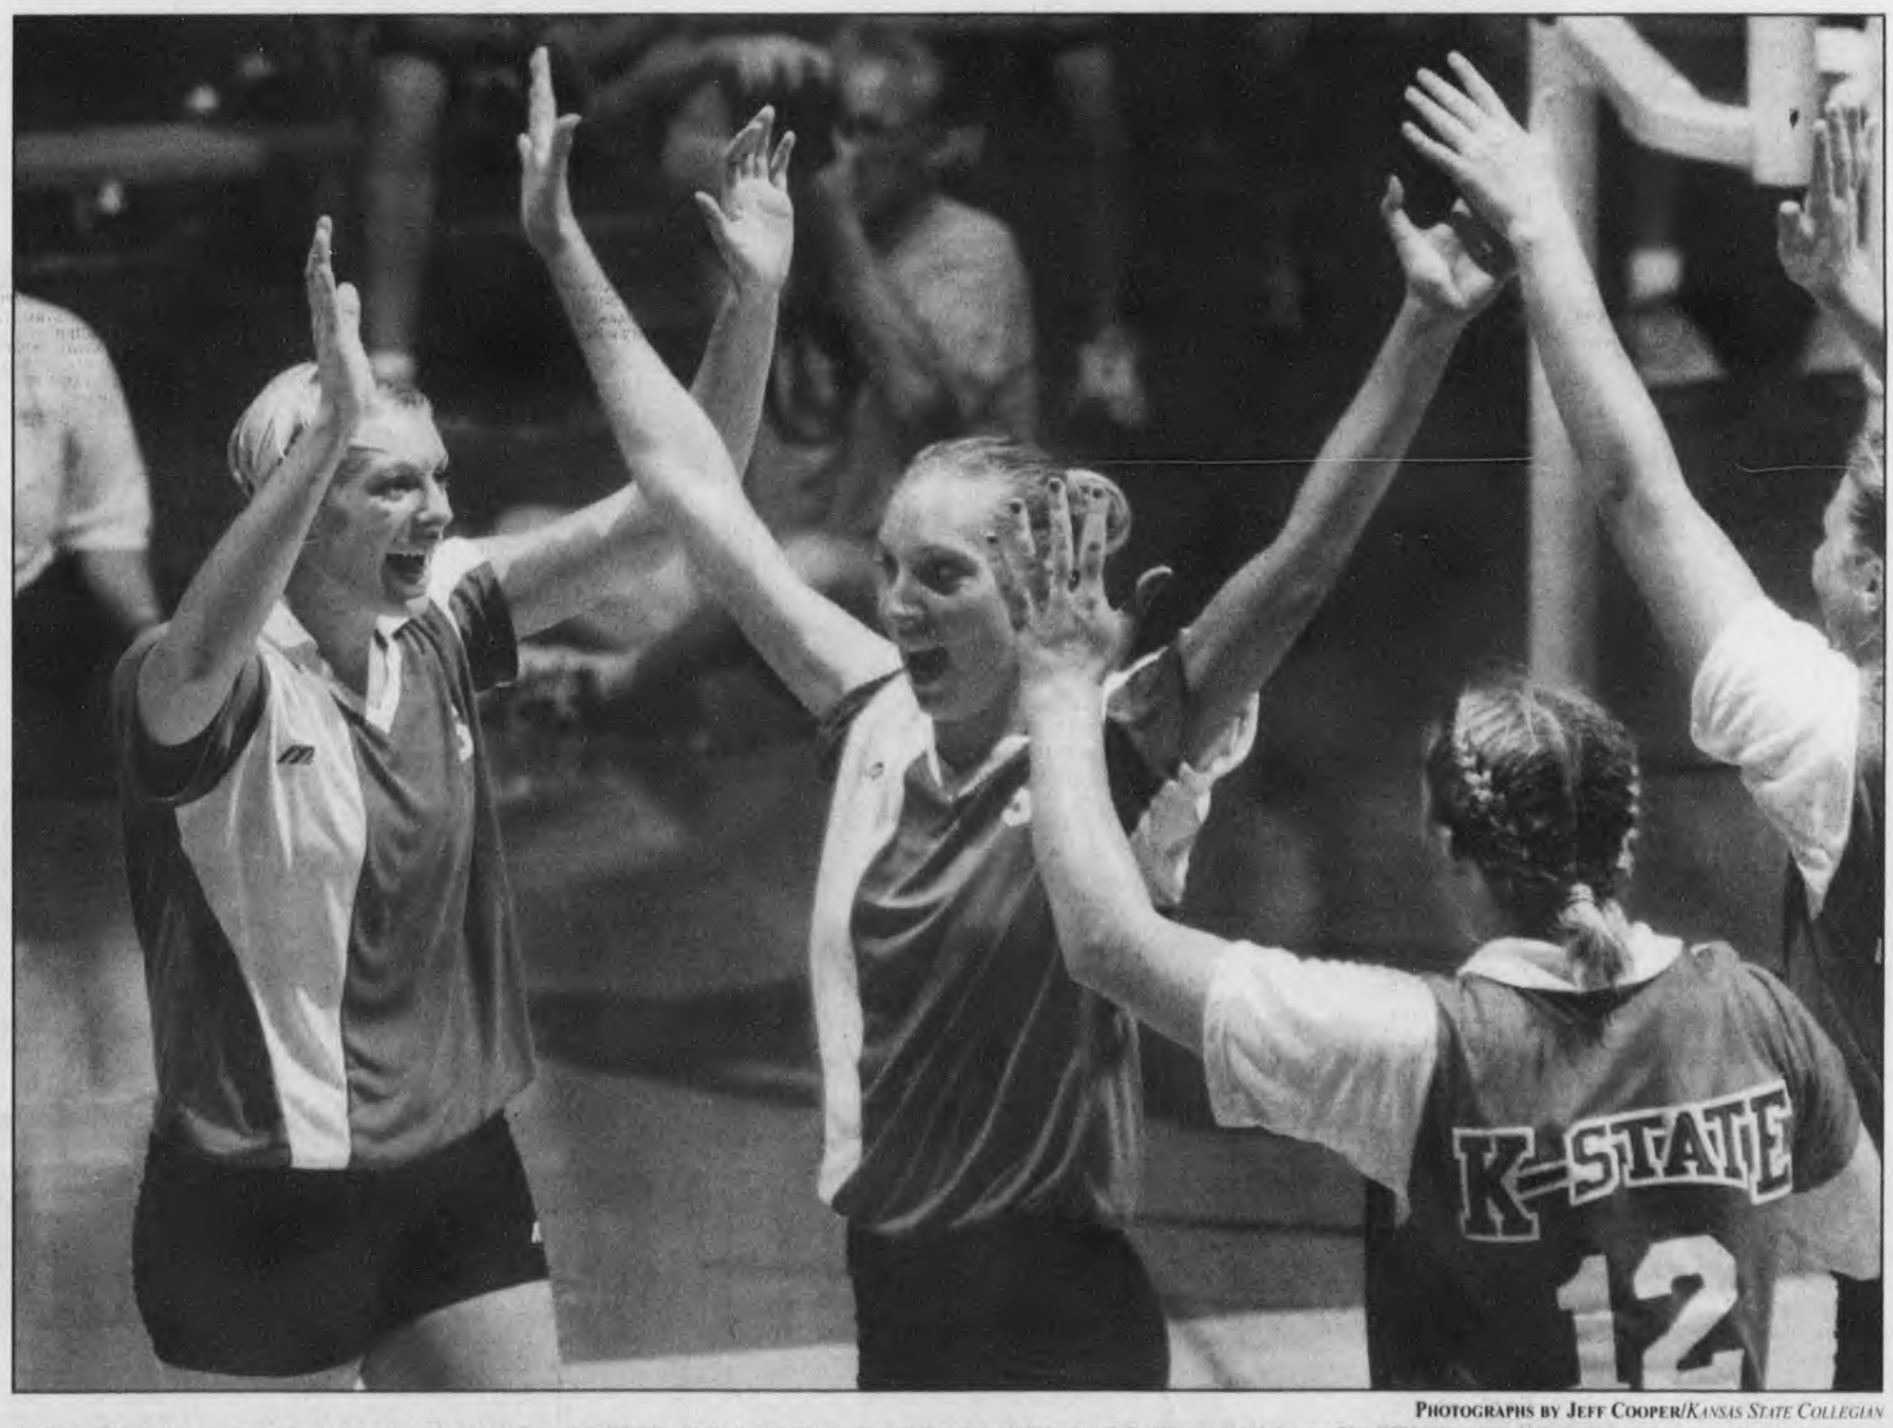
"It didn't really feel like I did it," Zschau said.

"I just go the same every day, and that just comes along with it."

Dawn Cady also picked up a double-double with 17 kills and 11 digs. Wieck chipped in with 11 kills and eight digs.

Wieck added three block assists and now needs just three more to become the Wildcats' all-time leader in that category.

"Val was average early and great late," Wiemers said. "Later in the match we just kept feeding her the ball and feeding her the ball, and they couldn't stop her."



With the three-game sweep, the Wildcats have now won all three of their matches and all nine of the games they've played at Ahearn Field House this year.

The Cats now hit the road again for the Bank of Fayetteville Classic in Arkansas. K-State will play Arkansas Thursday.

They'll take on Miami of Ohio Friday. The Cats then wrap-up the tournament Saturday against Illinois.

Gramatica, Chiefs, Whitlock make headlines in unpredictable week in sports

In a game that should not have been played, even on a Sony PlayStation, due to its graphic content, Gramatica made the carnage that was K-State's victory over Illinois State worthwhile with one giant boot from beyond midfield.

For a guy who puts his heart and soul into every contribution, it's rewarding to see a class act such as Gramatica receive the spotlight for one afternoon in college football.

■ Will there be any marquee names left in college football when the first ever Bowl Championship Series is unveiled in December? Although I'm positive K-State will be invited to the party, many traditional powerhouses already have taken steps toward removing their names from the guest list.

First to step up to the chopping block was Michigan. The defending national co-champion couldn't even survive one week before its dreams of repeating were dashed. Notre Dame made quick use of the Wolverines inexperience at quarterback and seemingly revived Irish pride with one victory.

However, before Notre Dame even had a chance to get comfy with the big boys in the Top 10, Michigan State crashed the party. Taking out all the rage built up after a 0-2 start, the Spartans dismembered the Irish, 42-23. After the upset, the only things left as proof that Notre Dame had passed through were little Irish chalk outlines.

Perhaps the biggest blow to the bowl series was Florida State's disappearance from the race. The former No. 2 team in the land, FSU made a strong argument for prescription eyewear after its gift-wrapped loss to North Carolina State.

Twenty-six-year-old Seminole quarterback Chris "Baby Grandpa" Weinke earned his way onto the NC State Christmas list after tossing a school-record six interceptions, which disabled Florida State's air attack and contributed to a 24-7 loss.

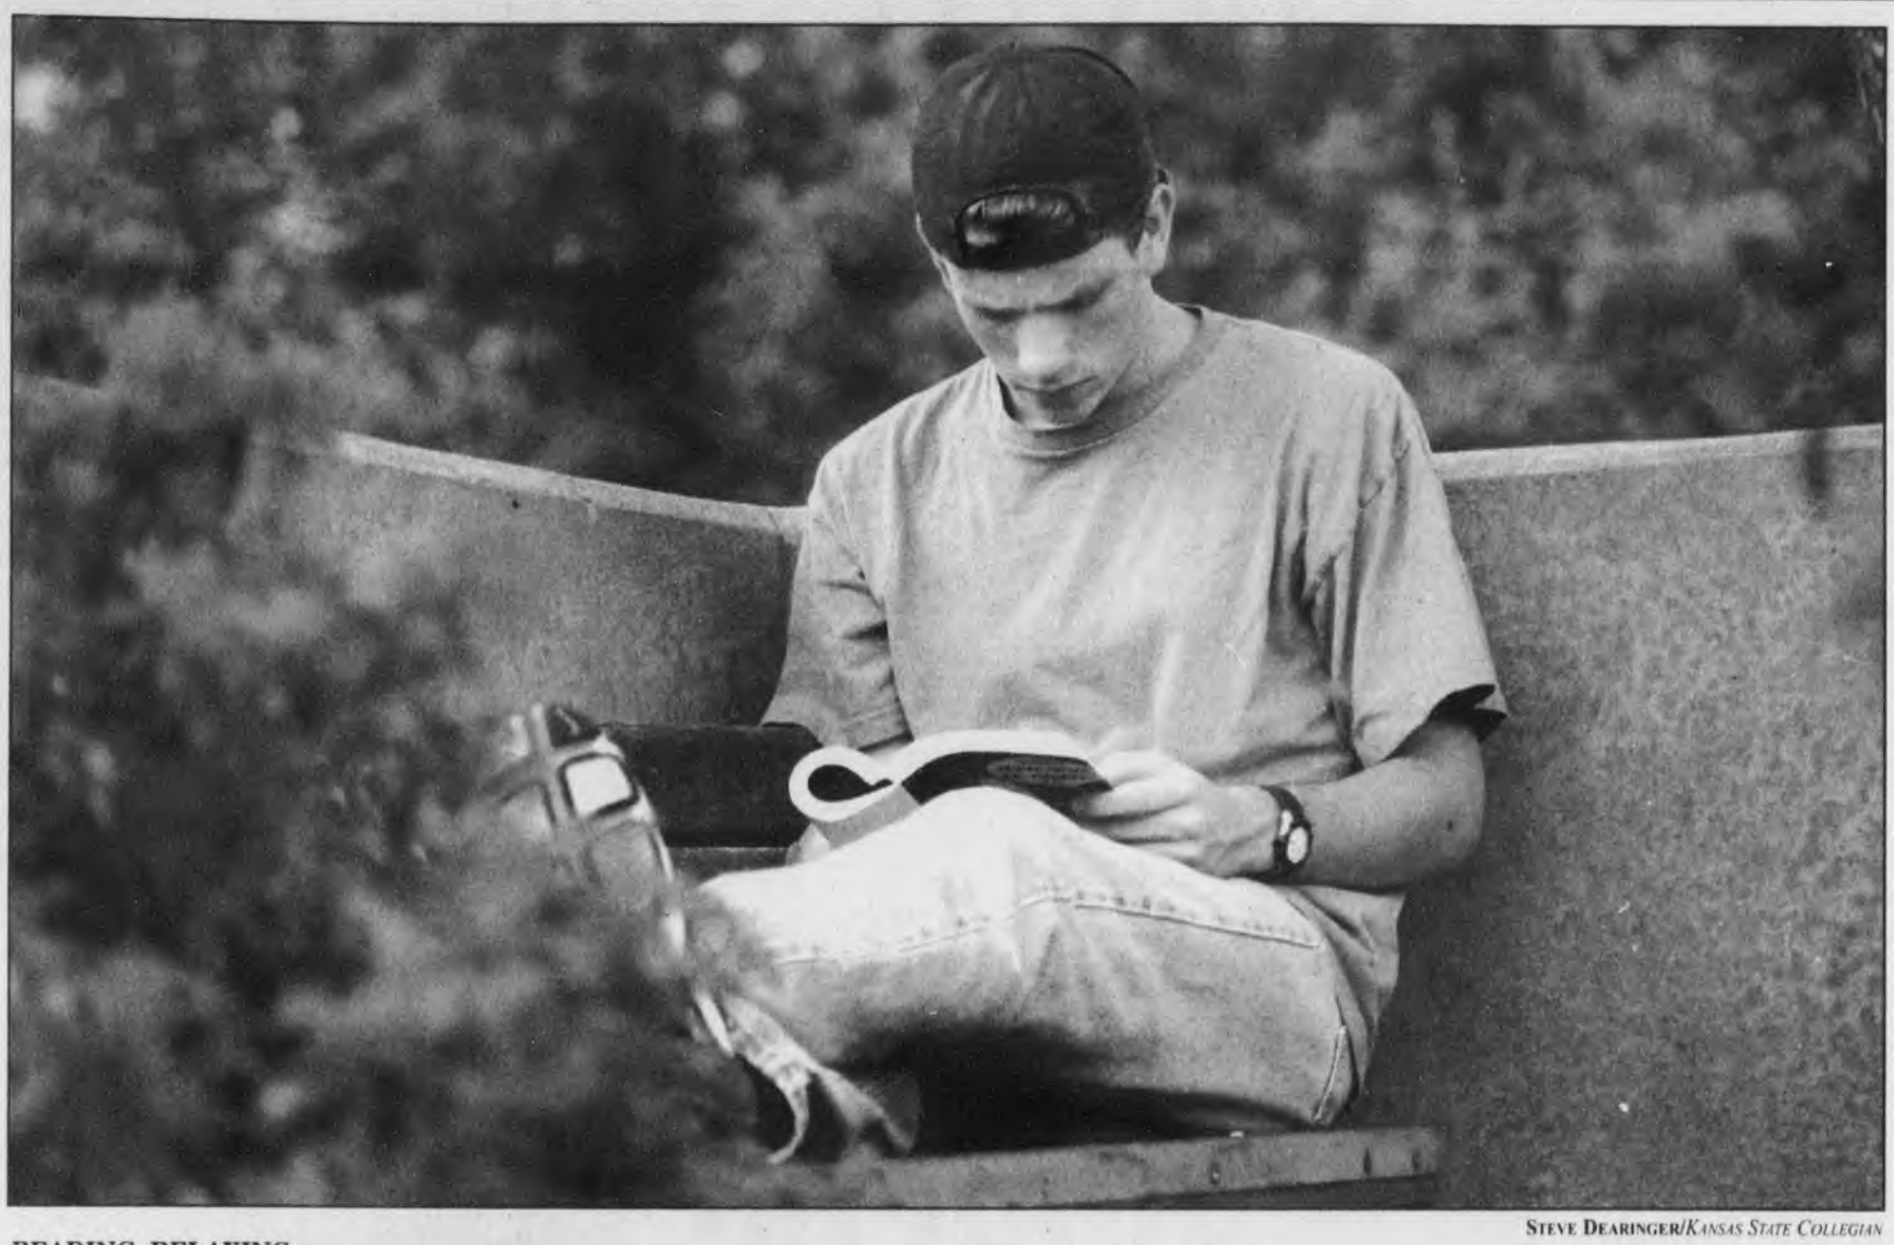
So, with only two weekends of college football in the books, three prominent schools have erased their names from title consideration. With that said, who knows which team will suddenly be dubbed a "major contender" by the bowl powers that be. Will it be the mighty Hokies of Virginia Tech? Or perhaps the vaunted Zips of Akron? Only time (and upsets) will tell.

■ Who will win the National League MVP? Who cares. Who deserves it most? Thy name is Sammy Sosa.

Throughout the season, Sosa has kept the Cubs wild-card hopes alive, battled his way back into the home run race and kept the media and fans happy with his personality. Although Mark McGwire broke the record first, Slammin' Sammy's been working overtime with two races to worry about.

In a fair and perfect world, McGwire gets the record and the recognition; Sosa gets the MVP and a playoff berth for Chicago.

■ There comes a time when a man must admit his mistakes, and that time has come for Kansas City Star sports columnist Jason Whitlock. For the unaware, Whitlock predicted the Chiefs would finish the regular season undefeated. That prediction ended Sunday in Jacksonville after the Jaguars beat the Chiefs, 21-15.



In all fairness to Whitlock, the Chiefs took the field Sunday with so many starters on injured reserve that the team could have passed for a "Casualties of War" photo.

■ Before I extinguish this column, one thing remains to be said: As purple as my bloodstream might be, my eyes are focused on Missouri-Ohio State this weekend.

Although my heart remains with the Cats, my thirst for great matchups overpowers my circulatory system. Besides, who can resist watching Corby Jones challenging the mighty Buckeye defense led by linebacker/classroom scholar Andy Katzenmoyer? Not I.

Loss prompts Schottenheimer to change Chiefs' practice routine

BY DOUG TUCKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Tired of settling for field goals instead of touchdowns, the Kansas City Chiefs are changing their practice routine.

Instead of using Thursdays and Fridays to work on what coach Marty Schottenheimer calls "the gold zone offense" — offensive plays inside the 20-yard line — the Chiefs now will emphasize that part of their game on Wednesdays.

"The positive thing offensively has been our ability to move the ball and score. We've scored in over 40 percent of our possessions," Coach Marty Schottenheimer said Tuesday. "The problem is too many field goals and not enough touchdowns."

In seven trips inside the 20 against Oakland and Jacksonville, the Chiefs had just two touchdowns.

"That's not good enough. You'd like to think you can get touchdowns about 70 percent of the time. That would be a winning effort," Schottenheimer said.

Timing has been the biggest problem, but the situation has worsened by a change of quarterbacks. Rich Gannon played against Jacksonville after Elvis Grbac hurt his shoulder in the season opener against Oakland. Gannon is expected to start Sunday against San Diego.

"Timing is such a part of effectively throwing the ball in the gold zone, and that is the product of people working together. It's a lot of little subtle things," Schottenheimer said.

The problem was obvious last week during a 21-16 loss in Jacksonville.

"We missed a couple of plays there in the gold zone," Schottenheimer said. "We just think by spending more time on it we can become more efficient."

Near the goal line, Schottenheimer said, the field becomes constricted.

"When you throw the ball down there, you have to be precise, because you're working in a smaller area. Little subtle things become key, such as the way a route is run, given the congestion down there. We had a couple of situations at Jacksonville.

"A guy was 2 yards away from where he needed to be, running on an oblique angle away from the line of scrimmage rather than running parallel to the line of scrimmage, and that put us in a situation where we couldn't throw. It gets that specific," Schottenheimer said.

Royals extend Muser's contract

BY DOUG TUCKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Royals, despite uncertainty over their ownership, on Tuesday extended manager Tony Muser's contract through 1999.

Muser, 51, was hired off the coaching staff of the Chicago Cubs during the 1997 All-Star break to replace the fired Bob Boone and is 100-128. Going into Tuesday's game against Oakland, the Royals had lost only three games to first-place Cleveland in the AL Central.

"If you want a tough job, be a major league manager," Muser said.

"It's tough, but that's what I like about it. When you walk out of this ball park after a win, and somebody has done something good that you've been prodding and talking to and preaching to, it can make all the tough times go away real fast.

"I think that's what it's all about," he said. "It's feeling good that you've helped somebody improve, that you can get a group of people together and going in one direction."

The day hardly could have been more upbeat for the Royals. The team beat the Oakland Athletics 6-3 for its first four-game home winning streak in two years, and guaranteed its will not finish last in the AL Central for a third straight season.

"I'm glad to be back and am looking forward to another year in Kansas City," Muser said.

The move was popular among the players.

"All the players are delighted for Tony," said center fielder Johnny Damon, who singled and scored his team-leading 95th run against Oakland. "He works hard, and he gets along with all the young guys. This will give us stability going into the off-season."

A former first baseman who spent parts of nine seasons with the Boston Red Sox, Chicago White Sox and Milwaukee Brewers, Muser was in his fifth season as a major league coach with the Cubs when the Royals hired him.

There had been speculation the Royals would not extend Muser's contract until their ownership situation was resolved.

Kansas State University Transportation Analysis Public Workshop

KSU Parking Services will host a public workshop from 2:00 to 6:00 p.m. on Wednesday, September 16, 1998, in the McCain Auditorium Lobby. The consulting team from TranSystems will display and discuss data collected to date. TranSystems is also consulting with the City of Manhattan in the Manhattan Area Transportation Study. The Workshop will also provide the University an opportunity to comment on four primary focus areas:

- Does K-State need a transit system?
- ...a parking garage?
- Does K-State's roadway network measure up?
- What does the consultant suggest for pedestrian travel?

Public input is needed to assist in making decisions which will impact Kansas State for many years to come.

Services available to assist students in picking majors

COLLEGIAN STAFF

Look around.

Picking a major, or finding a better one, can be a daunting task. And while services all over campus might cater to varying needs, all campus advisers give the same suggestion when trying to pick a major — look until you find what fits you.

Shauna Trenda, junior in family studies and human services, had just finished her first year as a criminology major two years ago when she realized she needed a change.

"It was really interesting, but I didn't know what I was going to do with that," Trenda said.

In the summer between her freshman and sophomore year, Trenda began to look around until her adviser mentioned the field of art therapy.

Trenda said she'd been interested in art before but didn't even know about that major.

Trenda is now beginning her second year in the major and said her love for art motivates her more than lecture hall tests with more than 100 students.

"I get a lot of positive feedback. I think it just kind of motivates you," Trenda said.

When looking for a major, Trenda said talking to people in person and on the Internet helped her the most.

"If you had no idea, I'd take the most general classes," Trenda said.

Emily Morrison came to K-State as an undecided freshman but is now a senior in psychology. Morrison said she had areas of interest when she arrived but wanted to decide between majors in education, pre-medicine or psychology before she was placed in one program.

Though the Academic and Career Information Center assessments and visits to her adviser helped, Morrison also looked on her own to see what she liked best.

She said the toughest part of searching for three semesters was the patience required to sort through all of the material. Students need to take the time to explore their interests and find something they can see themselves doing and enjoying, she said.

"What was important for me was finding something I could be successful at and grow within," Morrison said.

ACIC coordinator Tinsley Furry said her office offers two assessments designed to use student responses to questions on skills, work values and preferred work environment to generate a list of possible careers and contacts.

Once they have an idea of what looks good, students should look into those professions, Furry said.

"Experience different classes. Look around at careers they see every day, if they go to a bank or a restaurant," Furry said.

ACIC also makes frequent referrals to other offices for students' needs, Furry said.

"It's not like (students) step in our office and that's it," Furry said.

Dan Wilcox, counselor with University Counseling Services, said UCS offers personal assessment programs for students, including the Career and Decision-Making Workshop and the Major Decisions class.

In addition, students can make appointments with an individual counselor for assessments and not be afraid of being psychoanalyzed, he said.

Some individuals are more difficult to classify by forms and tests, Wilcox said.

"That's information a student can use, but it's not a letter from God saying 'You will do this,'" he said. "I would not advise taking no action. A lot of times for people, not doing anything is where they get stuck. I kind of feel one step leads to another."

Club's fundraiser might seem like nutty idea

By KELLY EVENSON
Kansas State Collegian

Campus squirrels might go hungry this fall — for a good cause.

The Recreation Park Management Club picks up acorns every fall and sells them to nurseries in the area. The acorns are then used to plant oak trees.

"One of the professors in the department has contacts and sells them for us," Laura Sleichter, club president, said.

The profits from the acorn sales, which totaled about $1 per pound last year, are put toward community-service projects and help sponsor a spring-break trip for the club.

"We hiked for four days, backpacked and then got snowed on," Sleichter said.

Adviser Sid Stevenson said the club meets twice a month and performs service projects in Manhattan.

"The group is a mixture of social and professional business. We also have speakers come in," Stevenson said.

One of the club's major upcoming projects is building a nature trail at the northern end of the Tuttle Creek State Park at Fancy Creek.

Vice President Matt Enoch said club members work with Tuttle Creek State Park officials to find out the best way to lay the trail. Then, they go out on the weekends to actually cut the limbs and lay the rock for the nature trail.

"It allows club members to find out what real-world experience is like and to learn to work with other people," Enoch said.

Most of the club's members are majors in recreation park management. But Stevenson said the majority of students in the program didn't start there.

"There are not a whole lot of freshmen in the department," Stevenson said.

Stevenson also said most students switch to the Horticultural, Forestry, and Recreation Resources department because they want to give something back and enrich people's lives.

"It is a career where people can look forward to going to work," Stevenson said.

Station to open in July, but Manhattan still faces hurdles to becoming "clean city"

BY SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With plans underway for a public compressed-natural-gas fuel station in Manhattan by July, volunteers involved in the budding Clean Cities program hope it will start a change for the better.

"I think this gives the Clean Cities a great deal of impetus because it solves the infrastructure for this alternative fuel," said Diane Stoddard, assistant to the city manager and Clean Cities coordinator.

The program, directed by the U.S. Department of Energy, is designed to promote alternative fuels at the local level. To apply, cities must meet certain criteria, including a local transportation survey and meetings with stakeholders in local businesses and institutions.

Stoddard said the next phase in the program is to gather from these stakeholders non-binding commitments, which state that they intend to purchase alternative fuel vehicles or otherwise help the transition to new fuels.

If Manhattan can prove it is a viable site for alternative fuels, it will be officially designated as a "clean city" and eligible for grants and other funding.

Liberal and Hugoton, Kan., already have received clean city designation; the Kansas City area is scheduled for official designation in November.

"The U.S. Department of Energy has been trying to make this program very local and very non-bureaucratic, trying to gather information on the future of alternative fuels before granting designation," Stoddard said.

Once the fueling station has become a reality, Stoddard said she hopes buyers will see incentives to purchase alternative fuel vehicles for both businesses and individuals.

One supporter of the Clean Cities program is the local Ford Transportation and Design Manufacturing facility, which modifies Ford vehicles for compressed-natural-gas fuel capability to send back to dealerships.

TDM Plant Manager Jim Hague said the city already has surpassed one of the toughest challenges of this transition — establishing customer confidence in the product by familiarizing them with it.

Another challenge is to put the actual vehicles on the streets. Hague said he estimated there are eight alternative fuel vehicles in Manhattan and nearly 75,000 other vehicles running on petroleum fuel.

"We need to balance that equation. It just tightens the issue," Hague said.

There is still the problem that in July there still will be only one station. Hague said individuals don't want to risk driving across town on a near-empty tank to the only filling station in town. The solution is for other groups to get involved in the station.

"If we bring any public transportation system to Manhattan, clearly it should be alternative fuel-based," Hague said.

European Union authorizes sale of Viagra in 15 member-nations

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BRUSSELS, Belgium — The European Union on Tuesday authorized sales of Viagra, and the manufacturer of the anti-impotency drug said it would be widely available by mid-October.

The drug was approved by the EU's 20-member executive commission on the advice of a panel of European medical experts.

Viagra will be available only with a doctor's prescription and may not be supplied to patients younger than 18 or taken by women.

Several of the 15 EU nations said they would not subsidize the drug through government health programs, meaning most patients will have to pay the full price for the blue, diamond-shaped pills.

Each pill is expected to cost the local currency equivalent of $6 to $8, said Vic Micati, executive vice-president of Pfizer Pharmaceuticals in New York.

Pfizer will have to include a leaflet in all packages explaining that Viagra should not be used by those with severe heart or liver problems or patients taking drugs containing nitrates. The leaflet says nobody should take Viagra more than once a day.

Micati said at news conference Viagra could be available in some EU nations within 10 days. Britain, Sweden and the Netherlands are expected to be the first to get the drug.

It should be in pharmacies in most other EU nations by mid-October, but bureaucratic procedures in Greece and Belgium might delay distribution in those nations for a few months.

EU governments are considering whether to make the drug available free of charge or at subsidized prices through state health programs. Most won't for the moment, fearing a rush to get the drug could strain the finances of health agencies.

Britain's Health Secretary Frank Dobson told doctors they should not prescribe the drug free. He estimated that would cost the National Health Service $82.5 million to $247.5 million yearly.

"Most people in this country don't think we should finance it through the health service as a sort of recreational drug at the expense of doing things, that are more important," Dobson said to BBC Radio.

Micati said Pfizer was talking with authorities in all EU nations in an effort to persuade them to cover costs of Viagra purchases.

"We have the view that erectile dysfunction is a serious and now an easily treatable disorder," he said. "We think reimbursement is very appropriate."

Pfizer said the EU approval brought the number to 38 countries in which Viagra has been cleared.

In the five biggest EU nations — Germany, France, Britain, Italy and Spain — Pfizer estimates 15 million men ages 40 to 70 suffer from impotence.

Since Viagra was authorized for sale in the United States in March, the drug has been prescribed to more than 4 million American men, according to Pfizer.

POWs and MIAs to be honored at service

Former POW will relate experiences

BY ELIZABETH SCHOFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All he had to do was get home.

Maj. Carl Fyler, a B-17 pilot, would end his World War II tour after this, his 25th mission.

But Fyler didn't make it home that day. His plane was shot down, and he was put in a German prisoner-of-war camp. For the next 510 days, hunger and pain from untreated injuries consumed Fyler's world before he was rescued.

"WE WERE THE GUYS IN FRONT. WE DON'T WANT TO BE FORGOTTEN."

— MAJ. CARL FYLER PRISONER OF WAR

Fyler, a retired dentist from Topeka, will speak of his experiences and the history of American prisoners of war and soldiers missing in action at an 11 a.m. memorial service Friday at the Main Post Chapel on Fort Riley to observe National POW/MIA Recognition Day.

Capt. Michelle Mitchell said the mayors of Ogden and Junction City are expected to attend the service, as well as former POWs, MIAs and their families in the Junction City and Manhattan areas. The service, officiated by command chaplain Col. Gregory Schanepp, is likely to draw 150 to 200 people, Mitchell said.

The service will be about an hour long and will include a prayer, scripture reading, the lighting of a remembrance candle and a moment of silence, Chaplain Ben Stalling said.

"We invite anyone in the area who would like to attend," Stalling said.

"Normally it's very somber," Public Information Officer at Ft. Riley Deb Skidmore said. "There's tears in those guys' eyes. They remember."

In speaking at the service, Fyler said he wants to relay the importance of POWs and MIAs and what they went through.

"We were the guys in front," he said. "We don't want to be forgotten."

Fyler, author of "Staying Alive," formed the first Kansas chapter of the Ex-Prisoners of War in his living room in 1974. He has spent many years since then working toward free medical and dental coverage for POWs.

The Kansas chapters of the Ex-Prisoners of War serve about 700 men and women. Fyler said it is important for the organization to help those who can't help themselves.

"We take care of our people," Fyler said.

Wallace mourners view open casket at capitol

THE ASSOCIATED PRES S

MONTGOMERY, Ala. — Hundreds of black and white Alabamans on Tuesday filed past the open casket of former Gov. George Wallace at the Civil War-era Capitol of Alabama where he once vowed, "Segregation now, segregation tomorrow, segregation forever!"

"I loved Governor Wallace," said Karen Lott of Birmingham, one of the mourners filing through the Capitol where Jefferson Davis was sworn in as president of the Confederacy in 1861.

"I believed in what he stood for — honesty, decency, and he didn't believe in drinking. He had family values."

Malia Ragan, one of many state workers filing through the rotunda, said: "It's a real sad day. I think it's the end of an era."

Wallace, who died Sunday of cardiac arrest at age 79, was elected governor four times — in 1962, 1970, 1974 and 1982 — with his first wife, Lurleen, winning in 1966 as his stand-in.

During his years in Montgomery, Wallace attracted national attention for his fiery rhetoric on race. In 1963, when he was sworn into office, he said, "In the name of the greatest people that have ever trod this earth, I draw the line in the dust and toss the gauntlet before the feet of tyranny. And I say ... segregation now, segregation tomorrow, segregation forever!"

That same year, he made his "stand in the schoolhouse door" to try to prevent blacks from enrolling at the University of Alabama. He tried, again without success, to block the Selma-to-Montgomery voting-rights march in 1965.

Wallace was shot by a would-be assassin as he campaigned for president in 1972 — his third bid for the presidency. The gunman, Arthur Bremer, remains in prison in Maryland.

Bremer argued in a letter written last year and released Tuesday that he should be freed because shooting "segregationist dinosaurs" is not as bad as hurting mainstream politicians.

But by his fourth term, Wallace courted and received black support, and he appointed blacks to Cabinet-level posts and judgeships.

"He was a straight man," said Joe Rudolph, a black man hired to work in the governor's office mail room in 1967. "He had respect for me as a black person. A lot of people had a misconception about him. ... I could go to him and talk to him."

Virginia Shearin, a Montgomery woman who first saw Wallace in 1964 as he campaigned on a flatbed truck, was among the first in line to walk past the casket.

"I thought he was a courageous man," she said. "If he had been president, he would have been one of the greatest presidents, because he was for the common man, the working man, the underprivileged, the underdog."

Eight state troopers carried the casket, draped in a flag of Alabama, up the south steps and into the Capitol rotunda. Wallace family members, along with Gov. Fob James and his wife, Bobbie, followed the casket up the steps and into the building.

Wallace will lie in state until Wednesday afternoon, followed by a public service at the First United Methodist Church and burial at Greenwood Cemetery in a plot next to his first wife.

Though they don't really fly, the Flying Karamazov Brothers, an entertainment troupe, will perfom at 7:30 tonight McCain Auditorium.

The Flying Karamazov Brothers bring light-hearted comedy to McCain

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Flying Karamazov Brothers is a group that truly doesn't live up to its name.

The quartet consists of four men who don't fly (except on commercial airlines during their tour), who aren't Russian and who aren't brothers. They do, however, perform a combination of music, comedy and sight gags.

The Flying Karamazov Brothers (pronounced kara-maht-soff), last performed in McCain Auditorium on Oct. 19, 1984, and will return to K-State to perform "Sharps, Flats, and Accidentals" at 7:30 tonight.

Jennifer Nash, publications manager for McCain, said the variety in the Brothers' acts will keep audiences spellbound.

"There's so much to see," Nash said. "They'll juggle, they'll play music, and they'll even do both at the same time."

Kristin Brighton, communications director for McCain, said the visual entertainment is for all ages. However, political satire in the group's comedy is geared toward a more mature audience.

"Students will think it's a hoot," Brighton said. "It's a comedy routine with a spin on it. It involves physical and verbal humor. I think this will be the students' favorite show of the season."

Like a comedy, the Brothers will play a wide variety of music, from Bach to bluegrass to classic rock.

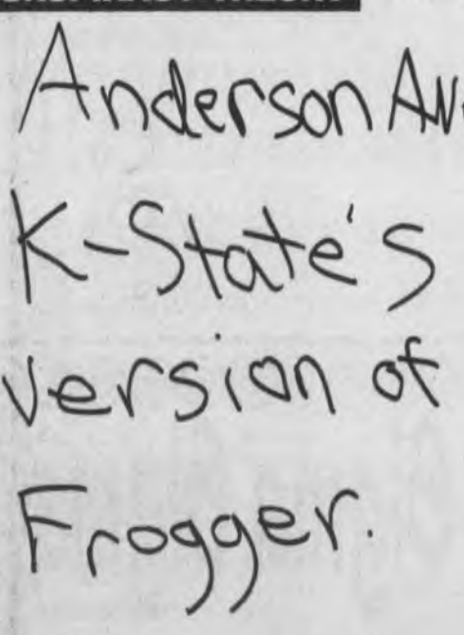
Nash said it is this variety that keeps world audiences entertained.

"It's not strictly theater. Their routine is constantly changing," she said. "You could see a show today, and it will be different next week."

The Flying Karamazov Brothers' best-known routine is titled "The Gamble." Ivan Patterson, member of the Brothers, will juggle any three objects supplied by the audience. The objects must be heavier than an ounce, lighter than ten pounds and no bigger than a breadbox. If he can keep all three objects in the air for longer than 10 seconds, he receives a standing ovation from the audience. If he fails, he receives a pie in the face.

In past shows, audiences have challenged Patterson with such items as bowls of Jell-O, a chain saw, cacti and a 9.5-pound dead octopus. Nash said her goal for Wednesday's performance was, in fact, to get Patterson a pie in the face.

It is this audience participation that the Flying Karamazov Brothers encourage at all of its shows, David Frain, assistant director of McCain, said.



"They love audience participation," he said.

"They've specifically requested to be close to the orchestra section for that very reason."

Nash said with the audience participation, music and comedy, this will be a show that audiences won't soon forget.

"With the Flying Karamazov Brothers, everyone gets to be a part of the show," Nash said.

CONSPIRACY THEORY — TAYLOR GRIMES

Mac MacDonald to perform at Rowdy Trouty's tonight

BY JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For anyone who cannot stand to hear "Margaritaville" for the umpteenth time played on the bar jukebox, Rowdy Trouty's would like to offer a little something new.

Pianist and acoustic guitarist Mac MacDonald will be putting on a special performance at 9 tonight at Rowdy Trouty's.

MacDonald, originally from San Diego, has been featured on Showtime and opened for entertainers such as Redd Foxx, Andrew Dice Clay and George Straight. MacDonald usually plays in the Ozarks during the summer and goes to Breckenridge, Colo., to entertain the skiers in the winter. Rowdy Trouty's managed to snag the singer on his way through Manhattan.

"We were really lucky to get him," owner Mike Trout said. "Hopefully, he'll agree to play here whenever he comes through town."

Audience members should be warned that sitting near MacDonald could mean getting pulled onstage. Crowd participation is a big part of MacDonald's act, Trout said.

"He might pull someone onstage, put a wig on them and make them sing reggae with him," Trout said. "He'll definitely be able to keep the crowd going all night long."

Instead of tickets, there will be a $1 cover charge at the door. Rowdy Trouty's drink specials for the night will be $3 you-call-it schooners and $1.50 pitchers.

KU 'Loveline' show still an option for students

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although the hit MTV show "Loveline" isn't visiting Manhattan, K-State students still can get in on the action.

"Loveline" cancelled its initial visit to Manhattan, scheduled for Nov. 16 but still is going to make a stop in Lawrence to do a show at the University of Kansas. Tickets for the show are sold out, but KU donated four of its tickets to K-State.

"They thought we got a raw deal, so they gave us four free tickets," said Karen Schlabach, president of Union Program Council. "We're very grateful to them. KU is very generous to consider our misfortune, since we couldn't reschedule our date for the show."

Interested students should go to the UPC office on the third floor of the K-State Student Union. A drawing for the tickets will take place at 1 p.m. Friday; winners will be notified soon after.

The "Loveline" presentation will be at 7 p.m. Friday at KU's Lied Center.

The UPC office will be open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Wednesday and 8 a.m.-9 p.m. Thursday.

For more information, call the UPC office at 532-6571, or the Lied Center at (785) 864-3469.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSCOW — Russia's new government showed some of its cards Tuesday, proposing to print money to pay back wages and impose some Soviet-style controls over the market — but also making a key appointment to enhance its reform credentials.

The head of the centrist Our Home Is Russia parliament faction, Alexander Shokhin, was named deputy prime minister in charge of financial issues — a daunting job as Russia tries to pull itself out of its economic morass. He said he expected another member of his faction to be named to a Cabinet post later.

Russian liberals and media have been making doomsday predictions that the new government, under Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov, will represent a retreat to Soviet-era economic policies.

Primakov, who conferred with President Boris Yeltsin on new Cabinet appointments Tuesday, insists he is only trying to create a team that represents all the major political and economic factions, including the Communist Party.

Aside from a few preliminary measures, Primakov has not announced any economic program and appears to be seeking political consensus rather than quick economic action. He has asked to be given up to a year before his policies were assessed.

Still, there have been indications the government intends to play a stronger role in the economy.

The measure "is long overdue," Gerashchenko said. "That should have been done last year."

New First Deputy Prime Minister Yuri Maslyukov — a Communist Party member who nevertheless has shown himself willing to work in a reform-oriented government — also has advocated the measure.

No one in the government has called for reviving Soviet-era fundamentals, such as fully nationalized industry, price controls or ending the free flow of capital and the ruble's convertibility.

The Communist Party, which has formed the most solid opposition to Yeltsin, has distanced itself from the new administration. Communist leader Gennady Zyuganov said the appointment of Maslyukov, a former central planner, and Gerashchenko, a former Soviet chief banker, was a Kremlin initiative, not a Communist proposal.

Yeltsin assured French President Jacques Chirac during a telephone conversation Tuesday that Russia "will not deviate from the course of economic reforms," Yeltsin's press service said.

Gerashchenko said he supported printing more money to pay off many months of unpaid wages.

"We can't do without that," he said.

However, he did not say if the increase in the money supply would be underpinned by the Central Bank's hard currency reserves. If the bank simply prints money not backed by assets, that would erode the value of the ruble and could lead to hyperinflation.

Gerashchenko, who served as the Soviet and then-Russian top banker in 1989-94, has been criticized broadly in Russia and the West for inflationary policies during his previous tenure.

But Primakov, Shokhin and other government officials insisted the measures would not overturn reforms and promised to walk a tightrope between paying wages and maintaining control over the money supply.

No decision on increasing the money supply will be made until the Central Bank's new board of directors is in place, Gerashchenko said. The board is scheduled for a confirmation vote in parliament today.

Marmaton River recedes; guard members sent home

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT SCOTT, Kan. — A state of emergency still exists for Bourbon County in southeast Kansas after relentless storms pushed the Marmaton River out of its banks and flooded sections of downtown Fort Scott.

However, Kansas Army National Guard members called out to the area Monday night were sent home Tuesday morning, guard spokeswoman Joy Moser said.

Gov. Bill Graves declared the state of emergency Monday after Sunday's storms. Business owners and residents of the 10 homes that had been evacuated started returning Tuesday, as did the 40 residents of the Scottview senior citizen apartments who were evacuated Monday afternoon when the basement started flooding and the electricity had to be turned off.

"The river is still up to the bank, but people are resuming as normally as they can with their regular lives," Lt. Ron Gray of the Fort Scott police department said Tuesday. "There's going to be a lot of cleanup."

Workers from the Bourbon County Red Cross sent teams out to assess damage, executive director Patty Gorman said.

She said her agency helped place Scottview residents who had no local family to stay with in motel rooms Monday night. The agency also has set up a temporary shelter at the Community Christian Church.

Moser said there are no plans to have guard members return. She said declarations typically are made for 15 days and remain in effect for the entire time. She said 15 guard members from an engineering battalion were sent to Fort Scott to relieve local law enforcement officers, who had been on the job for 36 consecutive hours.

Rescue workers from the fire department and the Kansas Wildlife and Parks department rescued three men who wandered into the edge of the river and were swept away by its current Monday. The workers used a parks department boat to get to the young men, who were hanging onto trees, Fire Chief Jeff Davis said.

Fort Scott police reported all roads open Tuesday morning, including U.S. 54 west of Fort Scott to Uniontown, which had been closed because of flooding.

A complete assessment of the roads and bridges damaged in the flooding would not be possible until all the water receded, county coordinator Jim Harris said Monday.

The National Weather Service reported 12.5 inches of rain fell Sunday in Fort Scott, and 7.73 inches fell in Farlington in Crawford County. There were 32 other towns across the state reporting 1 inch or more of rain.

The service issued a flood warning for the Marmaton River in Fort Scott. The river's flood stage is 38 feet, and it crested at 50.5 Monday night. The river was expected to drop below 43 feet late today.

The Little Osage River at Fulton in southeast Kansas also crested Monday night at 28.5 feet, flooding area roads and some fields.

Lewinsky told at least 11 people about affair with Clinton

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — No wonder they were caught: Monica Lewinsky told at least 11 people about the affair, sent revealing e-mail from her Pentagon computer and even sparked a ruckus at a White House gate.

As a presidential paramour, the independent counsel's report portrays her as astonishingly indiscreet and remarkably demanding. Psychologists say Lewinsky behaved like many women who become involved with powerful men only to end up dumped and disillusioned.

According to Starr's report, Lewinsky began flirting with the president only a month after arriving at the White House in July 1995 as an unpaid intern. A few hours before their first sexual encounter, the report said, she flashed him a peek at the top of her thong panties. She was 22 years old.

It was Lewinsky who is said to have pushed Clinton to become more emotionally intimate after their first hurried physical encounters. "Is this just about sex ... or do you have some interest in getting to know me as a person?" she asked during their fifth tryst in three months, according to the report.

Following her cue, he began talking more. She decided they were in love, even telling friends the pair might have a future together, according to the report.

"Almost every young woman who has an affair with a married man thinks it's love, and he will get divorced," psychologist Joyce Brothers said. "That's really how women, even today, have managed to convince themselves that it's OK to have this fling."

Later, when she was transferred to a Pentagon job and their relationship was relegated to occasional sexy telephone calls, she began hovering near him at public events.

As the president shook hands with important donors at his 50th birthday fund-raiser, Lewinsky reached across the rope line and touched his crotch in a "playful" fashion, according to her testimony.

Although she sounds bold, Lewinsky described herself as "an insecure person." One of her therapists, Dr. Irene Kassorla, testified that Lewinsky suffered from depression and low self-esteem.

That might be one reason she was attracted to the president, as some women are drawn to athletes or movie stars, Les Parrott, a psychology professor at Seattle Pacific University, said. Parrott, who studies relationships, has never met Lewinsky.

Lewinsky and her family have declined to comment on her testimony or feelings.

Insecurity also might explain why she told friends, despite assuring Clinton that no one knew about them.

"Can you think of another person in the world who would validate your worth as a human being more than the president of the United States?" Parrott asked. "How can you keep that secret?"

According to Starr's report, Lewinsky told six friends and a former boyfriend about the affair, often in explicit detail. She wrote e-mail about it on her computer at the Pentagon. She confided in two therapists and her mother. Lewinsky even described one of the sexual encounters to an aunt, who made it clear she didn't want to hear any more.

She also told presidential friend Vernon Jordan that she had "telephone sex" with the president. She alluded to the relationship in a remark to Clinton's secretary, Betty Currie, who cut her off before she could say more.

Eventually, an anonymous tip alerted the lawyers representing Paula Jones in her sexual harassment lawsuit against Clinton, and Lewinsky was named as a potential witness.

It might have been the power of his position that first attracted her, but by the end Lewinsky was treating Clinton more like a recalcitrant boyfriend than a president.

They argued. She cried. She complained he "was not paying enough attention to me." According to the report, she became enraged when Secret Service agents at the White House gate told her the president was meeting with another woman.

She wrote peevish letters demanding he help her get a good job in New York. "I know that what is going on in the world takes precedence, but I don't think what I have asked you for is unreasonable," she wrote at one point. She made vague threats to end their affair.

She told Jordan she "didn't really look at him as the president" any more. Instead, she "reacted to him more as a man and got angry at him like a man and just a regular person."

Parrott said her attitude, oblivious to Clinton's position and what was at risk for them both, defines the popular term "crazy in love."

"To be so brazen with the president of the United States only makes sense when you are truly in love with him," he said.

Even as everything unraveled, long after he had broken off the affair and she was weighing how to get out of testifying in the Jones case, Lewinsky kept pushing for more.

Last Jan. 4 she dropped off a final gift at his secretary's home: A book on the presidency and a love note saying she hoped to have sexual intercourse with Clinton at least once.

The next day, Clinton called. In their last known conversation, Lewinsky admitted, "I shouldn't have written some of those things in the note." The president agreed.

Democrats signal support for GOP tax-cut plan, but not surplus spending

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Democrats signaled support Tuesday for an $80 billion Republican tax-cut plan that has broad political appeal, but not if it is paid for by a budget surplus that Democrats want reserved to preserve Social Security.

"It looks like a very, very good proposal. Most of the provisions in it have been Democratic provisions," said Rep. Charles Rangel of New York, the top Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee. "The only problem with it is the Republicans haven't found a way to pay for it."

The five-year plan outlined by Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Archer, R-Texas, would be financed almost entirely by part of the $1.6 trillion budget surplus projected over the next decade. Republicans argue that Americans' tax burden should be reduced with a modest cut, and the rest of the surplus should be set aside to ensure Social Security doesn't go broke.

"As long as we make it very clear that we are committed to saving Social Security, the American people think there should be some of the surplus given back to them," Archer said. "We need to be sure we infuse more money back into the pockets of taxpayers."

President Clinton and most Democrats have opposed using the surplus to pay for tax cuts. But Tuesday, it became clear the election-year popularity of many items in the GOP bill is making Democrats uneasy, and some are looking for alternative ways of paying for them.

The tax bill originally outlined by Archer would benefit two-earner couples who now pay a "marriage penalty," help farmers deduct losses and smooth income ups and downs, allow the self-employed to immediately deduct 100 percent of their health insurance premiums and exempt small savings accounts from taxes on interest.

To that list, Archer added provisions Tuesday for education and working senior citizens, saying the total cost still would add up to roughly $80 billion.

For prospective college students and their parents, the proposal would include private colleges and universities under an existing law that exempts taxes on money used for prepaid tuition accounts. The current law applies only to public colleges and universities.

"Many of the private colleges have said they've been at a disadvantage competing with the state-supported institutions," Archer said.

For the working elderly, the plan would increase the limits a person can earn before Social Security benefits begin to be reduced. For 1999, that would mean an increase from $15,500 under current law to $17,000; Archer said every $1,000 increase in the limit allows a person to keep another $333 in Social Security benefits.

In addition, the legislation would relax certain rules on issuance of bonds to free more money for local school construction.

Rangel and other Democrats said some Democrats might offer amendments when the legislation is considered Thursday in the Ways and Means Committee that would identify sources other than the budget surplus to pay for the tax cuts. One possibility, he said, is some kind of tobacco tax increase.

Another possibility would be a so-called "trigger" mechanism that would allow use of the surplus only when it is guaranteed to be available, not just projected.

"We're going to make sure the Democrats get an opportunity to support the bill," Rangel said.

Whatever the outcome in the House, Republicans face a difficult task in the Senate. Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., pledged again Tuesday that the Senate will consider whatever the House produces, but some moderate Republicans continue to raise questions about how the surplus is to be used.

In addition, Senate procedural rules require 60 votes to move ahead on most controversial legislation, and only 55 senators are Republicans.

"I sense a lot of ambivalence here," said Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., chairman of the Budget Committee.

Furniture industry, consumer group grapple over safety rules

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A furniture industry campaign to block new rules requiring sofas and armchairs to be flame resistant has won an unusual ally — a member of the commission pressing for the fire regulations.

Consumer Product Safety Commissioner Mary Sheila Gall, the three-member panel's only Republican, endorsed a move in Congress calling for an outside study to determine if the fire-retardant chemicals could pose health hazards. That study could delay the fire-safety rules by at least a year.

"If we find that we need to do a standard, it has to be something that's reasonable, that industry can deal with," Gall said. "We're not in the business of putting American workers out of their jobs."

The industry also got a boost from another government agency — the Small Business Administration. Like Gall, officials in the SBA's advocacy division wrote a letter mirroring the industry's concerns.

Republican Rep. Roger Wicker, whose Mississippi district includes 30,000 furniture workers, wrote the House provision requiring a study of any adverse health effects from fire-retardant chemicals.

The provision was attached to the House's 1999 appropriations bill for the Veterans Affairs and Housing and Urban Development departments and independent agencies including the CPSC. The Senate's version doesn't include the provision. The measure's fate depends on how congressional negotiators resolve differences between the two.

The maneuvering shows part of the tortuous course some federal regulations travel as lobbyists try to push them along or block their path, even playing different parts of the government against one another.

"In a checks and balances system, lobbyists are extremely adept at finding the checks," Rogan Kersh, a Yale University political science professor, said. "Frontal attacks rarely work. It's much better to go behind the scenes."

The CPSC began looking at furniture easily ignited by a match or lighter in 1994, after the National Association of State Fire Marshals urged it to do so. The vote was 2-1. Gall voted against it.

Commission statistics show blazes started on upholstered furniture were the leading cause of residential fire deaths.

The fire marshals hired a Washington lobbyist, Philip Sperber, who also represents a maker of fire-retardant chemicals. Sperber met with CPSC Commissioner Thomas Moore in May, four months after commission staff members met with the fire marshals' group.

Meanwhile, furniture industry officials met six times this year with CPSC staff to deliver the message that fire-retardant chemicals might pose a health hazard and the new regulations could cost $600 million a year, cutting into the profits of their $8 billion to $9 billion annual sales.

The industry's political action committees have given members of Congress $128,408 since Jan. 1, 1997, including $6,000 to Wicker, more than any other lawmaker, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

Wicker, who wrote his provision in May, noted that the CPSC recalled Tris-treated children's sleepwear in 1977 after the fire-retardant chemical was linked to kidney cancer.

"Some scientists fear that the chemicals for flame retardance cause cancer, birth defects, perhaps even gene mutations," Wicker said. "When there's that serious a dispute, and when the stakes are that high, it makes sense to have an outside, independent, unbiased group of scientists take a second look."

In August, commissioner Gall endorsed Wicker's efforts in a letter to House Appropriations Committee members: "While the commission's staff contains many technical experts and does the best that it can, the risks of cancer, birth defects or gene mutations from consumer products have not been the subject of much commission staff activity in recent years."

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Firm examines city, campus transportation problems

By MATT KREPS
Kansas State Collegian

Students, faculty and staff had their first opportunity to provide ideas about transportation and parking for the campus yesterday at a forum in McCain Auditorium's lobby.

The forum was part of a larger study for the city of Manhattan, and the K-State committee that was formed as part of the study was host.

Committee members and representatives from TranSystems Corp., the consulting firm hired to examine city and campus transportation needs, were on hand to give information and get feedback.

"The open forums are information-gathering sessions, and that information will be put together with the data, plus the consultant will use existing data," said Rita Newell, administrative assistant in the College of Human Ecology and a member of the steering committee.

Information gathered from the forum and other sources will be used to create an initial set of ideas to be presented at a forum Nov. 18, said Thomas Swenson, senior associate with TranSystems. Those ideas will be revised again before the final plan is put together sometime next spring.

"What's first and foremost on the university's mind is parking," Swenson said.

However, Swenson said other transportation issues such as bike trails, crosswalks, public transit options and travel patterns also will be considered as part of an overall plan for the city.

The K-State portion of the plan will play a key factor in the outcome of the city's plan, Director of Parking Services Darwin Abbott said.

"One of the things that the consultant has said is that our decision makes a major impact in what the city of Manhattan will do," he said.

Also, the K-State portion of the plan is more immediate than the city portion, which is more long term, Abbott said.

Task force submits proposal to Graves

Soon the Little Apple could be seeing some big changes.

A transportation task force led by the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce submitted a proposal to Governor Bill Graves' Transportation 2000 Task Force to improve Manhattan area highway, airport and rail transportation.

"We served as an ad hoc group to bring together the business community, government and education to discuss transportation and highway projects that are important to long-term sustainability and economic development," chamber president Dan Colantone said.

The group recommended at the Sept. 10 meeting to expand the Manhattan Regional

Spring game nets $19,000 for library

By DESIREE LAMBERSON
Kansas State Collegian

"We the people..." is a familiar phrase to everyone. We have read it in numerous books, and it has been taught in all American history classes. However, now students may get the chance to sign their names under this famous saying.

"We the people of the united colleges of Kansas State University, in order to form a more perfect library, do hereby express our gratitude and appreciation for the $19,000 donation in proceeds from the 1998 spring scrimmage. Thank you, Bill Snyder."

After a recent $19,000 donation to Hale Library by football coach Snyder, a large roll of paper, donated by Varney's Book Store, serves as a thank-you card. It is currently on display at the main entrance of Hale Library for anyone to sign.

SNYDER

■ OUR OPINION
The Collegian editorial board commends the $19,000 donation.

Karen McCulloh, assistant to the Dean of KSU libraries, said she decided to make the card to give everyone a chance to thank Snyder.

"He has been extremely supportive in many, many ways. He deserves much more than a small card," McCulloh said. "I just thought it would be fun if we had a real big thank you. I would be delighted if all the students came in and signed it."

Janis Crow, publicity coordinator for Hale Library, said it was important to thank Snyder, and the card is open for anyone, not just students, to sign.

"He provided a wonderful gift to the library, and we wanted some way to say thank you," Crow said. "Anyone is welcome who would like to sign the large card."

Crow said that for the past three to four years, Snyder has donated the gate receipts from the football team's spring scrimmage in May to the Friends of the Library.

McCulloh said some of the money was used last year to buy various furnishings throughout the library.

Although they haven't decided what this year's donation will be used for, McCulloh said that they do have some ideas.

"We will spend it on projects as they come up," she said.

Some of the projects may include creating endowments for journals, big-screen computers for disabled students and display cases for the fifth-floor gallery.

McCulloh said the library staff would like to purchase some display cases because it wants to display some of its rare and valuable books.

Because a few of the books are very old, some 100-years-old, they need special display cases to protect them.

"We need to have a safe, climate-controlled space where they won't be damaged," McCulloh said.

Ultimately, the Friends of the Library will decide where the money is spent, but McCulloh said the focus will be on increasing the number of volumes.

"I would definitely say that books and journals are being focused on the most," she said.

McCulloh said increasing the resources that the library provides is important, because it ultimately reflects on the university.

"The library is a good measurement tool," she said. "The top lists of this and that all look at the library."

With Hale having the smallest volume numbers in the Big 12, McCulloh said there needs to be improve-

Attorney General defines, clarifies Kansas Open Meetings Act

By LEW FERGUSON
The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Attorney General Carla Stovall affirmed on Wednesday an earlier opinion that serial communications among members of a public body constitute a meeting under the Kansas Open Meetings Act.

However, she provided clarifications that should help members of local-governing bodies know better when they might be violating the law.

In response to an inquiry by Gov. Bill Graves on behalf of the League of Kansas Municipalities, Stovall said she believes an opinion she issued last April "is a correct interpretation of the KOMA."

In that non-binding opinion, Stovall held that serial communications, popularly known as "calling trees," fall under requirements of the act — requiring them to be public — if the members involved make up a majority of a quorum of the public body.

Calling trees involve members calling or e-mailing one another, one after the other, to convey information or engage in discussion.

For example, if one member of a five-person board or commission talked to a second member, and the second member talked about the same subject to a third member, the three of them collectively constitute a majority of a quorum.

The league, individual cities and other entities, such as school boards and county commissions, were stunned by the April ruling.

The Legislature passed a bill that would have allowed public officials to confer about public business one-on-one, even if those individual contacts eventually involved a majority of a government board or commission's members, but Graves vetoed it.

Chris McKenzie, the league's executive director, said that in Wednesday's opinion Stovall appeared to have given public bodies additional guidance on how to apply the act, and for that he was grateful.

"While we may disagree in some respects with the new opinion, I think the direction she has headed is in agreement with what most public officials try to do," McKenzie said.

Graves posed four questions to Stovall, seeking clarification of how the law is to be applied.

Stovall responded to each of Graves' queries:

—What is the effect of a state Supreme Court ruling in a case involving the Sedgwick County Board of Commissioners? Stovall said it was irrelevant because the only issue in that case was whether commissioners could increase the number required to be considered a quorum under home-rule powers.

—Is the act violated when a third party such as a constituent or reporter relays something one member of a public body says to another member? Stovall said the act applies only to members of public bodies, and involvement of outside third parties doesn't count.

—Is it appropriate for the presiding officer or a staff member to contact other members to

Phelpses' not allowed to avoid prosecution

TOPEKA — The Rev. Fred Phelps Sr. and his son should not be allowed to avoid prosecution by claiming acts of alleged intimidation against a Topeka lawyer, a prosecutor told the state Supreme Court on Wednesday.

But Phelps, well-known for his crusade against homosexuals, said Shawnee County District Attorney Joan Hamilton "seeks to criminalize our religion."

Phelps said Lyon County Judge Melvin Gradert rightly had dismissed two counts of aggravated intimidation of a witness or victim against him and his son, Jonathan, in May 1997 by finding no probable cause.

Hamilton and Phelps argued their positions in an appeal brought by the state seeking to reinstate the intimidation charges and a misdemeanor disorderly conduct charge brought by Hamilton in 1993. The charges were based on a complaint filed by Topeka attorney Jerry Palmer.

Under normal handling, the Supreme Court would have a ruling on its next opinion day, Oct. 30. However, the court often takes longer than the next opinion day to make its decisions public.

Palmer alleged that Fred Phelps called him a "fat ugly sodomite" when Palmer was going to a fund-raising event in March 1992 in Topeka, at which Hillary Rodham Clinton was the featured guest.

He took a complaint to then-District Attorney Gene Olander, who did not act on it.

However, after Hamilton became district attorney, Palmer refiled his complaint, and Hamilton brought charges against Phelps.

After that, Hamilton alleged, Fred Phelps and Jonathan began engaging in actions intended to intimidate Palmer, including displaying a sign on their picket lines that said, "Pig Palmer FUS (fat ugly sodomite)," and another connected to it that said, "Fags Are Worthy of Death."

Judge Eric Rosen of Shawnee County found that there was probable cause to support the charges against the Phelpses, but they appealed, and Gradert held otherwise.

Researchers given $11 million for study

The University of Missouri is taking the lead role in an $11-million research project on the genetic makeup of corn.

What does this have to do with everyday life? Cleaner water, better crops and a more complete understanding of the genetic structure of other organisms, including humans, could all result from such research.

The university received the money from the National Science Foundation on Wednesday.

Missouri is teaming up with two other universities — Clemson and Georgia — to create a "virtual center" for the genetic research. About $8.9 million of the money will stay at Missouri with $1.6 million going to Clemson and about $500,000 to Georgia. Missouri's share is the largest single research grant the school has ever received.

"It is a multi-investigator, multi-institutional center without walls," said Judith Verbeke, program director at NSF. "Scientists who have similar research interests will come together using different skills to tackle the problem."

Ed Coe, professor of agronomy at Missouri, is the principal researcher for the five-year project. He said his team will map out corn genomes, or its DNA, in order to find desirable traits, such as disease resistance, to create more successful hybrids.

Coe's team will look at the 10 chromosomes, or DNA strips, of corn. With 50,000-80,000 genes in corn, the process is a daunting one.

The work on corn DNA has applications for the environment. Coe uses the digestibility of the phosphorous in corn as an example. If hybrids of corn are created that allow animals, particularly hogs, to more easily digest phosphorous, less of the substance would be excreted as waste.

And less of that phosphorus would end up in lagoons, eventually soaking down to and polluting groundwater.

In 1997, Sen. Christopher Bond, R-Mo., authored the $40-million Plant Genome Initiative that gave money to the NSF to create the grants.

The purpose of the initiative is to study the genetics of economically significant crops.

So far, Missouri is the only school to receive a grant for the initiative. Verbeke says other schools will be getting grants soon but wouldn't disclose the number of future recipients.

U.S. could see drop in rates, says Greenspan

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin and Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan tried to reassure Congress on Wednesday that economic turmoil spreading through much of the globe will not be allowed to derail the U.S. economy.

Greenspan laid to rest talk that a coordinated round of interest-rate cuts is imminent among significant world powers, but he opened the door even wider to a unilateral cut in U.S. rates.

"I just think it is not credible to perceive that we can remain the oasis of prosperity that we have been ... with the rest of the world under increasing stress," he told the House Banking Committee. He first expressed that view in a Sept. 4 speech that markets took as a signal of possible rate cuts down the road.

Greenspan also spoke of his concern that the currency crisis begun 14 months ago in Asia is spreading to other regions.

"Deflationary forces are continuing to emerge," he said.

Rubin stressed the same themes President Clinton raised in a speech Monday about a critical need for the United States as the world's largest economy to play an important role in resolving what Clinton termed the biggest threat to the global economy in 50 years.

"The rest of the world looks to the United States, as the world's indispensable nation, to show global leadership at times like these," Rubin said.

The appearance by the two men lifted spirits on Wall Street. Bond prices rallied on Greenspan's remarks about potential deflation, and the Dow Jones Industrial Average ended the day up 65.39 at 8,089.78. The stock gain marked the first four-session winning streak since Wall Street went into its steep summer swoon.

Economists said it is highly unlikely the Fed will cut rates at its next meeting on Sept. 29 but said a rate reduction at the Nov. 17 or Dec. 22 meetings is a growing possibility.

By pushing a third of the globe's economies into steep recession, the Asian economic crisis has depressed demand and prices for a number of commodities including oil. While economists usually view inflation as the bigger threat, falling prices for vital commodities such as farm products can create large problems as well, raising the specter of a global slump illustrated at its worst in the Great Depression of the 1930s.

K.C. landmark focus of architect's speech

The 1888 New York Life Building in Kansas City, Mo., designed by the prestigious New York architectural firm of McKim, Mead and White, will be the subject of a lecture at 7 tonight at the Manhattan Public Library.

Kevin Harden, AIA, who will present the lecture "Greening a Kansas City Landmark: The Rebirth of the Historic New York Life Building," was involved in the recent renovation of the building with his KC firm, Gastinger Walker Harden Architects.

The original building was, in its heyday, a technological wonder with elevators, day-lit offices and a structural steel frame. The renovated building has won many regional design awards.

The lecture, sponsored in part by the American Institute of Architects/Flint Hills and the Manhattan/Riley County Preservation Alliance, is in the library's new auditorium and is free to the public.

Making the news

■ Los Angeles Times National Editor discusses honesty of today's media.

BY JESSE MCCURRY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The national editor of the Los Angeles Times told K-State students and faculty on Wednesday that the news media can obscure the truth — and often do.

"You will hear no excuses from me," said Scott Kraft, K-State alumnus and this year's Bill Brown Master Editor in the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications. "There are lapses, very serious lapses."

The Bill Brown series honors a retired director of Student Publications Inc. and selects an editor each year to spend several days with K-State students.

"There's plenty of muck around these days," Kraft said in his speech titled "The Press: Doesn't Anyone Like Us Anymore?" in the K-State Student Union Big 12 Room.

With all the recent incidents of reporters making mistakes, these are troubling times for the media, Kraft said.

"At the L.A. Times and other respected newspapers, we're facing difficult questions every day," he said. "Several times a day we ask ourselves and each other, 'Is this story really relevant? Is it true?' We do our best, that's all we do. We do our best every day."

But some media don't, Kraft said.

"Today's TV-news anchors race on the air with rumors, and Matt Drudge fills the Internet with one-source stories that are sometimes true," he said. "Talk-show hosts spread more rumors than anyone in the media, in my view."

CNN featured the L.A. Times recently as its editors deliberated on whether or not to publish the Starr Report.

"I was describing acts not ordinarily discussed," Kraft said. "I hoped my parents weren't watching."

He said drawing that line can become difficult however, and journalists shouldn't get all the blame.

"There's plenty of blame to go around, but it isn't the press who forced Bill Clinton to have an affair with a subordinate," he said.

As for the L.A. Times' news judgment?

"We ran 80 percent of it in a 16-page special section," Kraft said. "It was a difficult decision when mentioning sex may not seem directly relevant, yet we felt like it wasn't for us to decide if it was relevant."

The L.A. Times did cut out parts of the report — mainly legalese, he said.

Kraft said Internet competition for news is rising, but the Internet has its drawbacks.

"Information on the Internet can be completely unedited," he said. "We'd rather be right than first. You can't imagine how much courage that takes."

Kraft said students and other consumers of news can safeguard themselves from suspect information by looking at where the information is coming from.

"Look at sourcing. The L.A. Times, USA Today and wire stories are often generally reliable," he said.

Kraft said students also would be served by reading both a local and a national newspaper.

Los Angeles Times National Editor Scott Kraft speaks to students on Wednesday afternoon in the K-State Student Union Big 12 Room. Kraft, who is visiting K-State this week as part of the Bill Brown Master Editor Series, was editor in chief of the Collegian in 1976. Kraft also has been a foreign correspondent for the Times and has lived in France and South Africa.

New dean sets goals for college

■ Veterinary-medicine alumnus returns to face new challenges as dean

BY JENNIFER WHITE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Editor's Note: This is the fourth story in the Collegian's "Meet Your Dean" series.

Ralph Richardson, dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, said he returned to K-State to find a very different college than the one he left in 1970.

"Fields are now subdivisions. These marvelous buildings did not exist then," Richardson said.

Richardson compared the return to his alma mater to slipping on a pair of comfortable shoes, and yet he is tremendously energized to see how K-State and Manhattan have changed.

One of his goals is to overcome the isolated perception of the college, he said.

"We need to become more integrated throughout the state, throughout the region of Kansas and Nebraska," Richardson said.

RICHARDSON

He said he wanted to strengthen the image of K-State's veterinary medicine program.

"I want to identify some major programs that will distinguish K-State Veterinary Medicine as a world leader, not only in that area, but also in cross-disciplinary strengths such as cardiovascular research, beef cattle and neurophysiology," he said.

Another goal is to strengthen the college's relationships with the rest of campus, particularly with the College of Agriculture and the Department of Animal Science, he said.

"We also want to communicate more with other colleges and departments that would have common issues related to research and teaching," he said.

Richardson also said he wanted to open the lines of communication within the college.

"I would like to see good communication between the faculty, staff and students, and between the departments — a feeling of ownership of being a part of veterinary medicine," he said.

Michelle Rudd, third-year veterinary-medicine student, said Richardson is genuinely interested in hearing what students have to say, and he wants to improve the college for students.

"I was impressed by his willingness to make time for me," Rudd said. "I could tell he was busy, but he still invited me to sit down and talk with him."

Richardson said students can drop by, call to make an appointment, invite him to their meetings or catch him in the hallways.

"It has been an absolute wonderful welcome," Richardson said. "I guess I feel honored and at the same time humbled."

Tuttle Creek Park to be renovated

BY GABE ECKERT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tuttle Creek State Park will undergo a $725,000 improvement project over the next three years. The funds are part of a $10-million program approved by the Kansas Legislature to fund improvements to the 24 state parks.

"Tuttle Creek State Park was built in the '60s, and the campers have changed a whole lot since then," said Todd Lovin, park manager for Tuttle Creek State Park.

Lovin said park visitors will see many improvements, which are scheduled to begin as early as December.

He said the park plans to upgrade camping sites, purchase new picnic tables and fire rings, improve restroom facilities and improve parking conditions. The park also plans to improve its water and electric infrastructure.

Park renovations will have a direct benefit for K-State students, Lovin said.

K-State's rowing and rugby teams both use the park for practices, and many students use the park for volleyball tournaments, philanthropies, fishing and other outdoor activities.

"The best thing we have going for us is being located near K-State," he said. "And with the luxury of a good football team, we are seeing an increase in visitors, especially campers."

Chad Luce, public information officer for the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks, said Tuttle Creek State Park provides more than recreational opportunities for students.

"Parks increase our quality of life," Luce said. "As our society gets more urban, parks provide a getaway."

He said the funds approved for state-park renovations will have an effect on the entire state.

"People are constantly looking for places to recreate outdoors," he said. "That is a niche where parks have an economic impact and improve community pride."

Hale Library benefits because of Bill Snyder

You'd be hard-pressed to find a K-State football fan who wouldn't call Bill Snyder a miracle worker.

A superhero.

In some cases, God.

But Snyder's work doesn't stop on the field. Recently, he donated profits from his new book to help fund a building for the Office of Leadership Studies and Programs. Now he's given $19,000 to Hale Library.

Snyder, who has been outspoken on the issue of the library and its funding problems for several years, donated the ticket proceeds from this spring's exhibition game as he has for several years. Now students have a chance to say thanks by signing a card for Snyder in the lobby of Hale.

Some would say the Collegian has waxed poetic on Snyder's accomplishments for too long and that other issues are more important. But Snyder's donation helps bring one of those other issues to light.

The administration's "top priority" last year — much-needed funding for journals and periodicals — has been bumped lower on the totem pole in favor of faculty salaries. Even though some funding was received from the Kansas Legislature and from the budgets of various K-State colleges, the problem isn't solved.

Snyder's donation should be used to fund journals in the library, and it should serve as another example of a creative solution to Hale's money dilemma. Student Senate voted down a privilege fee for library funding last year, and the Legislature isn't likely to approve any drastic increase in the budget.

Ironically, Snyder's success may be hurting the library, as well. K-State alumni are being stretched thin — sometimes obligated to contribute to the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund to support a budding athletics program. They'll also be asked to chip in when the KSU Foundation kicks off its $50-million scholarship campaign Friday. K-State alumni are famous for their monetary support, but the pot is simply becoming too big.

But overall, the donation should help bring more notoriety to a large university problem from which students suffer because it isn't the pet project of the Anderson Hall crowd.

Alumni shouldn't forget the library, either. Their donations would help fund a building that supports K-State's undergraduate and graduate programs.

This donation proves football does more for K-State than many choose to believe, and it reminds us that the library's funding problems won't go away overnight.

Press box could serve K-State as classroom problems mount

Editor,

I think I'd like a classroom like the Dev Nelson Press Box at KSU Stadium — climate-controlled and quiet. Maybe the students and I could get some work done at last.

Our regular classroom, Ahearn 205, isn't too bad unless:

(a) you open the windows and the traffic noises drown you out,

(b) the window air conditioner is on and that downs you out,

(c) the window air conditioner doesn't work, so the room is stifling. Opening the windows and propping the door open with a desk doesn't cool the place enough, and you have to move the class outside onto the grass.

That's OK for a little while, because some of my students (all of whom are from other countries) come from big, crowded cities where a lawn to sit on is a luxury. Some of them come from countries much poorer than the United States, and they are used to discomfort. In fact, many of the students are the best their countries have: Many are sponsored by their governments or by an internationally respected agency such as the Fulbright organization.

They are hard-working, mature people who are committed to studying here, who might not get to go home for two or three years — or more. My feeling, my impulse, is to show them and give them a share in the best we have — in other words, to honor them as they deserve. For starters, I'd settle for a quiet and thermally livable classroom, but if I were to offer them the best we have, it would be the press box.

Observations from the OPEN ROAD

In late July, my family made the annual car trip to visit my father's parents, known as Papa and Nana to their grandchildren, in Bloomington, Minn.

They say driving there is half the fun. I began to question this age-old saying, however, after 12 rounds of nearly every Milton Bradley travel-sized game ever made, writing an anthology of Beatnik poetry, learning Swahili in three easy steps and building a model of the Kremlin out of some rubles I found lying on the side of the street. Having accomplished the model and having no other use for the leftover rubles, I tossed them out the car window somewhere near Des Moines, Iowa.

As any tenured traveler knows, places such as this are the Mecca of tacky and tasteless souvenirs.

If you are a true lover of the open road, you'll heartily admit you enjoy making regular stops at these less-than-scenic establishments, only to ogle at all the cheap merchandise bearing the name of the state you happen to be in. If you actually purchase one of these homely treasures, you're quite brave and apparently have a load of money to waste.

Every year, en route to Minnesota and Papa and Nana's house, we stumble across different gas stations and convenience stores, and every year, we encounter the same junk and see the same impulse buyers greedily gazing upon these trinkets. Be on the lookout for these crazed transients, and know the types of "junk."

In an effort to educate would-be tacky-souvenir window shoppers, I have classified these gas station collectibles into several categories:

■ SNOW GLOBES: Nearly everyone and their mother has one of these. Whether it is a miniature of the Gateway Arch in St. Louis or a tiny Mount Rushmore, each snow globe has its own special little "world" enclosed in glass. I'll admit I once was tempted to buy an Arizona snow globe, just to enjoy the irony of snow in Arizona. But the temptation soon passed when I moved on to ...

■ AMERICAN INDIAN STUFF: This might include dream-catcher earrings, peace pipes and T-shirts. You've got to wonder whose idea it was to commercialize an entire culture. Personally, I've got to wonder if, somewhere, there is an American Indian convenience-store franchise that sells "white man's" merchandise. Again, more irony.

■ LOONEY TUNES STUFF: This trend will never die off. It is also inescapable. Should you stop at a convenience store on your next road trip, look for the sacred Tweety Bird or Tasmanian Devil shirts. These shirts usually are hanging, forlorn and dusty, at the back of the store, marked down to $3 and available in only one size. This is a disappointing blow to those who shop for their clothes at 7-Eleven.

■ UNWANTED TAPES AND COMPACT DISCS: I don't know why I shuffle through the meager selection at every stop; I know there are never any albums released after 1992, but I do it compulsively. After seeing multiple copies of every album released by Vanilla Ice, Reba McEntire, the Jackson Five and Patsy Cline (the queen of convenience-store tapes), it hit me. Places such as this are where a musician's music goes when their career dies. Call it a "music morgue," if you will; still, there is someone, somewhere, who collects them.

■ OTHER: This selection is the tackiest of the tacky, items so tasteless they cannot be classified into any one group. Items in the "other" category might include collectible spoons from every state in the United States, plastic back scratchers in the shape of a hand, Jell-O molds in the shape of the state you're in and those little plastic hula dancers that go on the dashboard of your car. Should you dare to purchase any of these items, be prepared to get laughed at by the cashier. It's happened, trust me.

My goal in writing this unorthodox column has been to introduce you to the wacky world of roadside souvenirs, stuff you'd never buy but like to laugh at. So proceed with caution and happy window shopping!

Oh, and if anyone has a snow globe from Pennsylvania, please contact me. My collection is almost complete.

Right decisions do not always produce good feelings

What is Congress to do? It could make decisions concerning our president's future with public opinion as a standard, but this was not the intent of our founders. Nor of our Creator.

Congress' decision will set precedence for future cases. If they use the polls, which have largely shown the President's job approval rating above 50 percent, not much can be done other than to pardon and forget. You can't very well suspend him for a month. Community service is out of the question. The options are few.

Our representatives do seek to know what their constituents think, and they should. We elected them. However, they operate under a higher obligation. Their responsibility is to do what is in the best interest of the American people, not American trend.

Our representatives have taken an oath to uphold the Constitution of the United States. This document is our protection. Our nation's founders established it to safeguard against changing styles and political fashions. They knew people were inclined to make decisions based on the now rather than the long run. They did give us a means by which we could amend the Constitution, but only with tremendous support and much difficulty.

The founders, in their writing of the Constitution, were aware of what governs us as individuals. They construed it to closely follow a higher law, the natural law. This absolute law, given to us by our Creator, governs between right and wrong. It is where we get moral absolutes.

The difference between the natural law and our Constitutional law is that the former is constant, while the latter can be changed.

Our conscience reminds us daily of moral absolutes: the way you talk to a friend; a child's decision to help a classmate who has tripped; a financial contribution to the American Red Cross; or how a wife speaks of her husband when he isn't near. All these circumstances give us opportunity to obey or break the natural law.

The failure of parents, teachers and leaders to impart knowledge of moral absolutes to children has resulted in my generation's doing what it feels best. If we are emotionally content, we tend to let things slide.

But what is good does not always feel the best.

If I make a decision to rescue a woman trapped in a burning car, serious or fatal injuries could be inflicted upon me. I have to make a rapid decision — my safety or her rescue?

I would want to do what is in my best interest. Common sense asks, "Why should I make a decision to risk my health or even life?"

The decision to help her would result because a higher law, acting as a standard for what is good, wins the war against my human desire for safety. The other option is to do nothing and later suffer a guilty conscience.

Even if I were to choose my own safety, the natural law still prevails by reminding me of my selfish choice.

These absolutes are not determined by my feelings or opinions. My decision to continually break the natural law would only desensitize the pain I felt in my conscience, but it would not make what is right any different.

The Bible is absolute in directing us toward living in a way that fulfills the natural law. It tells of how faith in Jesus is the only way to find complete freedom from the conflict we have with the natural law. It provides a means to do right when otherwise, we would have chosen only what felt good.

Congress' decisions concerning our president should be based upon our Constitution and its principles.

Ultimately, their decisions should be founded on the higher standard.

Growth causes concern

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Although plans for a new commercial center on Manhattan's west side are in the infancy stages, city-planning leaders are already buzzing about the project.

Much of the interest in one proposal by Junction City developer Russell Johnson is due to location — the shopping center would be along the north side of Kansas Highway 18 west of Warner Park Road. Some planners see this as the first direct threat to the viability of downtown as a retail center.

"In a town this size, it's going to impact the town center a great deal," said Ray Weisenburger, associate dean of architecture and member of the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board. "This is a real issue because I've been writing about the fragile nature of our town center for some time."

The Planning Board makes recommendations to the City Commission on planning, zoning and building-development issues.

Weisenburger said he'd like to see quality housing developed downtown in an attempt to re-center Manhattan around its downtown. He said the issue needs debate since continuing development on Manhattan's west side could potentially re-center the town to the west.

The 100-acre Johnson development is seen by many as a substantial attraction that could shift consumer spending away from established retail centers. The recent news that Wal-Mart, the national discount store, is hoping to open a store on the west side only seems to reinforce that geographic and economic shift in Manhattan.

Johnson, who has developed similar malls throughout the Midwest, said his strip mall could include big box department stores, fast-food restaurants and some upscale shopping that Manhattan doesn't offer now. He said the new development would diversify Manhattan's shopping and attract more consumers from farther away to the city.

"We can't do everything that mall can do," he said, referring to the Manhattan Town Center. "We want to enhance the mall. The east side is perfectly saturated. It's difficult to find land on the east side that accommodates a large number of tenants.

At last Thursday's planning board meeting, the proposed project was not discussed, but some members' comments offered hints on how the debate of the proposal could be framed.

In response to Miller Ranch developer Kert Rabe's plans to build a business park at the corner of Miller Parkway and Fort Riley Boulevard, planning board member Carol Peak expressed concern that a business park could act as a buffer zone between residential and commercial-retail development.

"For the record, I would like to say that I'm opposed to any kind of further commercial development down the way," Peak said.

For now, the Johnson development remains only a concept. Johnson has not approached the city in any official capacity about zoning or building issues.

Karen Davis, Manhattan's director of community development, said with any new proposal, the city staff makes recommendations to the Planning Board and the City Commission based on the comprehensive plan.

Although Davis hasn't seen Johnson's plans, she said, "I think there are some concerns. We spent a lot of time and funds doing the Manhattan Town Center because of the threat of other malls."

Manhattan's comprehensive plan specifically outlines the kind of commercial development thought to be in the city's best interest. In the commercial section, it reads that future commercial development would be sited "on the basis of promoting commercial centers rather than encouraging strip-commercial development along major highways and roadways within the community." It also promotes downtown as the commercial hub of the city.

Tom Phillips, vice chair of the Planning Board, said he's not too familiar with the project, but expects it to elicit some attention from residents.

"Based on the fact that the League of Women Voters have already voiced their concern about this development, I think there will be some discussion in the community about its growth," Phillips said.

Wal-Mart planning construction for new store on city's west side

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

If everything goes as planned, by this time next year a new Wal-Mart discount store will be opening on Manhattan's west side.

The national discount chain has recently announced plans to build a 150,000 square-foot superstore on land near the northwest corner of Fort Riley Boulevard and Seth Childs Road. The store would include a grocery store as well as items the store's more conventional east side outlet already carries.

Joe Knopp, local counsel for Wal-Mart, said the corporate decision to build the store was made after the transformation of Seth Childs Road from a two-lane road to a four-lane highway was finished. He said Wal-Mart had begun the process for building a store in the same location in 1986, but the project was contingent on the four-lane highway status.

"Seth Childs has been engineered to accommodate exactly the kind of development Wal-Mart will be," Knopp said.

A public meeting on Sept. 21 will focus on neighborhood concerns.

"We're anxious to explain the proposal to them and get their input on any issues we should address," Knopp said.

There has been talk on-and-off for the last five years about the possibility of a Target discount store locating on the west side. The most recent talk has projected a Target store as part of Junction City developer Russell Johnson's retail strip-mall plan for Manhattan's west K-18 highway. Johnson hasn't announced the names of retailers with whom he's negotiating.

Denise Workcuff, Target spokesperson, said Target has no immediate plans to locate a store in Manhattan.

"It's possible; we're looking," Workcuff said. "It doesn't mean it will or won't happen."

Workcuff said Target looks at between 200 and 300 sites a year for possible development. She said there are no current plans to build any new stores in Kansas.

The Wal-Mart project is a planned unit development, or PUD. This manner of development allows the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board the opportunity to discuss the development's landscaping, site plan and signage issues.

■ PUBLIC MEETING:
WHAT: the Wa-Mart proposal
WHEN: 7:30 p.m. Sept. 21
WHERE: Westview Community Church, 3001 Fort Riley Blvd.

Knopp said Wal-Mart hopes to take the proposal to the Planning Board by November and the City Commission in December. On that track, the store would possibly be open in fall 1999.

The original 1986 plan for Wal-Mart envisioned a smaller store with a stand-alone grocery store. The new development will utilize only about 20 acres of the roughly 25-acre site. The remaining acreage will be developed separately from Wal-Mart, although no plans for it have been announced.

Knopp said there are no plans to close the east-side Wal-Mart store.

Developers hope to keep Manhattan moving in right direction

City developers said they hope summer growth signals a boom in Manhattan's retail areas.

Chili's and Schlotzky's restaurants opened this summer and an Eddie Bauer store is projected to open Oct. 4 in Manhattan Town Center.

Andy Carlson, general manager of Town Center, said another restaurant also will be constructed in the parking area of the mall but would not comment on the name of the restaurant in the works.

"We're doing really well," Carlson said. "We hope to have a deal by the first quarter of 1999."

With a population of about 46,000 and a retail market of about 160,000, Manhattan is considered a small market. Large retailers generally look at markets of more than 200,000 people, Carlson said.

Golf team places 10th in Nebraska

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's golf team placed three individuals and took home a 10th-place team finish Tuesday at the Chip 'n Club Invite in Lincoln, Neb.

Senior golfer Mitzi Taylor posted a three-round total of 229 (73-81-75) and finished tied for 15th overall. Jane Yi tied for 28th with 233 (80-74-79) and Carrie Chambers was two shots over that total (78-79-78).

"They did a real good job," head coach Kristy Knight said. "They cut down on the big numbers. They did a good job with that. I'm proud of them. The veterans gained a lot of confidence in this tournament. I think the young players will be better after playing a course like this, too."

Taylor reiterated Knight's sentiments.

"I think we did real well as a team," Taylor said. "We went in there with a goal, and we far exceeded that. It was a tough course to play."

Knight knew going into the tournament that Taylor would have to be a leader this season with the amount of experience she has.

"I was pleasantly surprised, but I'm not surprised that she played well," Knight said. "She is a real consistent player. Her strength is keeping the ball in play, and she did that well. There are some long holes on this course, and Mitzi doesn't have such the distance on the shots, so she doesn't get the birdie opportunities.

"She chips and putts real well though," Knight said. "She had a good step ahead because she does keep the ball in play on those long holes. She gave herself a chance at par."

With a strong performance in Taylor's first tournament of the season, she now has to try to prepare and keep up the momentum for the next tournament.

"I'm happy with my finish," Taylor said.

"I was a little upset with my round of 81. In the next tournament, I'll have to keep in mind the thought process I had. I have to take it shot-by-shot and hole-by-hole. I can't rush anything. I'll have to try to do that again this week."

The lone freshman on the traveling squad, Lindsay Hammerschmidt, finished fourth with a score of 251 (82-83-86) but left Knight with encouraging thoughts for the rest of the season.

"She got a little frustrated with herself, because she had a bad front nine," Knight said.

"She came through with a good back nine. It's a matter of putting two nines together, and she'll do that. She has only played 36 holes of golf in a day once before, so I am very encouraged by her play. I saw some good things from her. She'll learn from every experience."

Sophomore Kelli Johnston also traveled with the team and competed separately as an individual for the invite. It was only Johnston's second college-level tournament.

"It was good experience for her," Knight said. "Kelli was frustrated at how well she played. She made a couple of big numbers. I told her she will be more confident in the future and learn from it. It is to everyone's benefit to get someone out to play as an individual like that. You'll look back on every experience and learn from the mistakes."

The women's next action is in Louisville, Colo., Sept. 20-22 at the Heather Farr Memorial. The top five finishers from the Chip 'n Club Invite will represent the women in Colorado.

"THEY'RE GONNA PASS THE BALL JUST LIKE THEY ALWAYS DO."

Cats prepare to face freshman Longhorn quarterback

BY JON BALMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Take a quick browse over the K-State football schedule, and chances are, you'll associate upcoming Big 12 Conference opponents with their respective quarterbacks.

There's Nebraska and Bobby Newcombe waiting in November. Right after that, Missouri and Corby Jones close out the season. And then there's Texas with ... Major Applewhite?

Although he may not come to mind when you think of Texas football, Applewhite will be taking the snap this Saturday afternoon when K-State is host to the Longhorns.

APPLEWHITE

A redshirt freshman out of Baton Rouge, La., Applewhite steps in for regular starter Richard Walton, who fractured a bone in his throwing hand during Saturday's loss to UCLA.

Already missing the services of backup quarterback Greg Cicero, who suffered a season-ending knee injury in a preseason scrimmage, Texas coach Mack Brown chose Applewhite to man the offense that will face the top-ranked defense in the Big 12.

Regardless of Applewhite's inexperience, K-State coach Bill Snyder said he believed the Longhorns would not limit their playbook with him in the starting lineup.

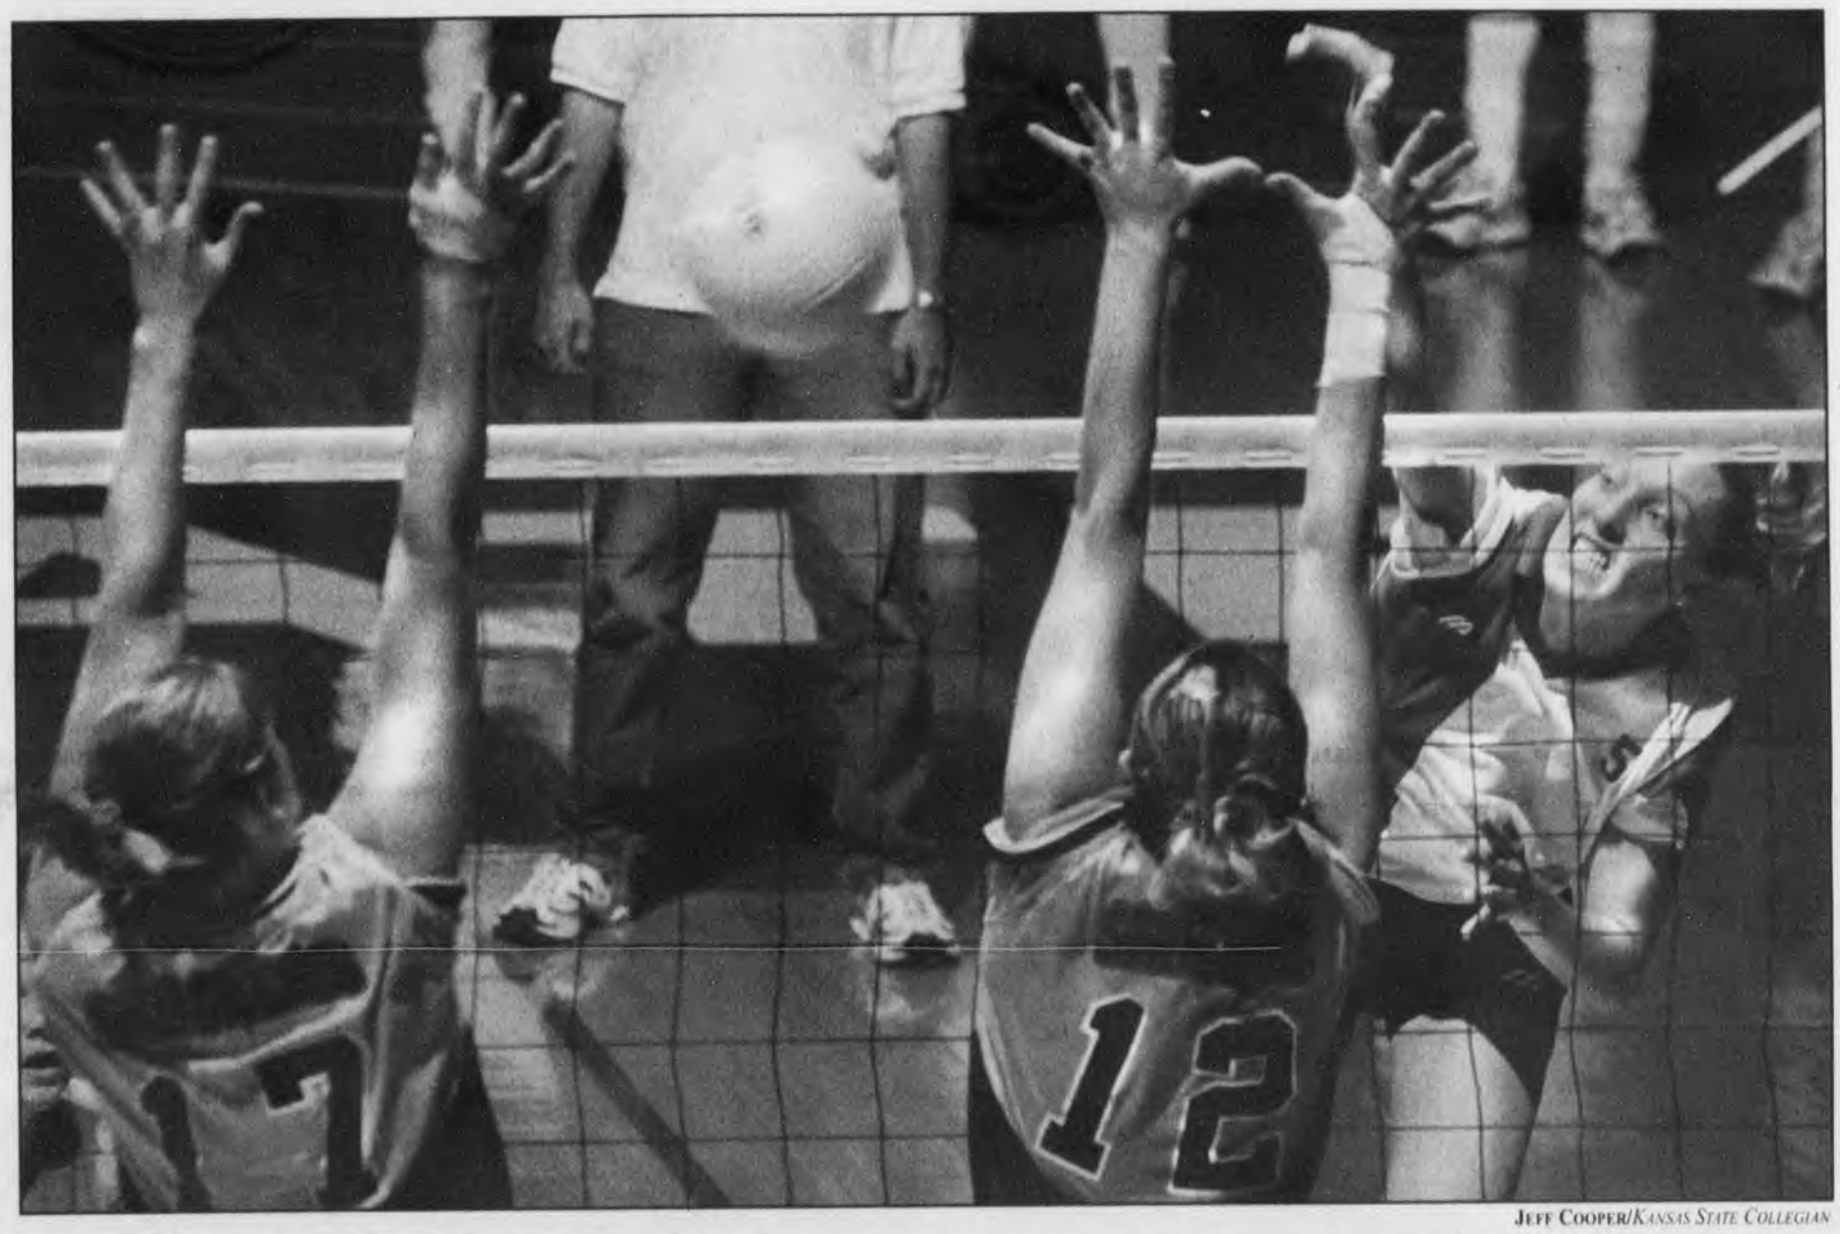
"He's probably taken as many practice reps as Walton has," Snyder said. "I don't know if they feel they need to condense it."

Before Saturday's injury, Walton guided an offense that led the Big 12 in passing offense with 268.5 yards per game.

Applewhite's inexperience may seem like a large advantage for K-State's defense, but the Longhorns' cupboard is far from bare. Still lurking in the backfield is running back Ricky Williams, a Heisman Trophy candidate with nine touchdowns to his credit this season.

WALTON

Due to this factor, defensive back Joe Bob Clements said the defense may not have an edge on the untested quarterback.



"There may not be much to take advantage of, what with Ricky Williams sitting back there," Clements said.

With more than 40,000 purple-clad fans ready to yell and an eager Lynch-Mob defense waiting to test him, Applewhite's baptism into college football as a starter won't be smooth. With nerves also factoring in, Saturday may turn into a very long day for the new quarterback.

Despite Applewhite's inexperience, linebacker Mark Simoneau said his mind won't be preoccupied with it at game-time Saturday.

"I probably won't even think about it," Simoneau said.

"They're gonna pass the ball just like they always do. From what I've seen, I think their quarterback is gonna be fine."

Netters head to Arkansas for tournament

BY BRENT STOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Last weekend, it was Gator Country.

This week, the K-State volleyball team ventures into Razorback Country — for the Bank of Fayetteville Classic in Fayetteville, Ark.

"We'd like to come back 3-0," Wildcat coach Jim McLaughlin said. "But our primary objective is to come back a better team — ready for Big 12."

After a three-game sweep of Wichita State on Tuesday night, the Cats will step up the competition with three matches in the next three days against quality opponents.

"You always want to keep moving up," senior Val Wieck said. "If we could go undefeated this weekend, we could prove that we can hang with the top teams."

The Wildcats open up tournament play Thursday with a 7 p.m. tilt against the host team, Arkansas. The 16th-ranked Razorbacks are the defending Southeastern Conference Champions and are off to a 3-1 start this season.

"They're big, and they hit the ball pretty high and hard on the left side," McLaughlin said. "Everything they've done is close, and they're winning some close games."

The Cats battle Miami of Ohio at noon Friday. The Red Hawks are coming off of a first-place finish in the Mid-American Conference and a trip to the NCAA Tournament.

Miami has jumped out to an 8-1 mark this season with its only loss coming to Fairfield. The Red Hawks are riding high after a 3-0 sweep of Xavier Tuesday night.

Miami is led by outside hitter Maggie Clark. The 5-foot-10-inch senior is averaging 3.39 kills and 3.13 digs per game.

Saturday the Cats will take on No. 22 Illinois. The Fighting Illini are 6-1 and coming off an early-season upset of 10th-ranked Texas.

Saturday's match with Illinois begins at 5:30 p.m.

"Three teams in three days is going to be difficult," Wieck said. "It's mostly concentrating on trying to get in our rhythm both offensively and defensively."

With three block-assists this weekend, Wieck can become K-State's all-time leader with 432 for her career.

"As far as records and awards go, they don't mean a lot to me," Wieck said. "I would be darn excited if we can go far in the NCAA Tournament."

Associated Press pollsters show once again they do not know what they are doing

Let me see if I understand:

UCLA beats Texas by 18 and K-State is favored to beat the Longhorns by 25, yet the Bruins leapfrog the Wildcats in the Associated Press poll? If UCLA is better than K-State, wouldn't the Bruins whoop Texas worse than the Cats should?

Sure, Johnny Appleseed — or whatever that quarterback is named — is going to be starting in place of the injured Richard Walton, altering the spread. But whoever plays quarterback for Texas on Saturday — it will be that guy blessed to be named "Major Applewhite" — should have an "RWB" instead of a "QB" listed as his position.

After all, Applewhite will be Ricky Williams' butler — he'll just stand there in uniform and make sure he hands Williams the ball.

So, what gives?

Do you believe the Associated Press poll or the Las Vegas sports books? I'm going to take the word of those who put their money where their mouths are, not their foot where their mouths are.

Anyway, I'm on a season-long quest to try to prove I know something about football. To do so, I'm picking a dozen or so games against the spread. I'm going head-to-head against a different guest challenger each week, and if I end up as the overall winner, I'll be officially qualified to write my opinions about football.

If not, I'll buy a yet-to-be-determined prize for the guest challenger who beats me by the largest margin and just go away.

Through two weeks, I'm very proud to announce that I'm beating my guest challengers, 15-7 to 10-12, but I must say, I'm very grateful for my previous guests' cooperation.

This week, Ife Obiorah, who I met Saturday night at a party, told me he's read my column, and he wants to go head-to-head.

He's a pretty smart guy — when I got his picks back, I found out we agreed on 10 of 11 games.

If you want to go head-to-head, e-mail me or call the Collegian — I promise I'll let you win. Think one of us is wrong? Send me all 11 winners before the games start and I will proclaim your greatness to the world next week.

And without any further UCLA hype — or should I say, useless hype — here are the games that Obiorah and I are picking this week.

1. Texas +25 at K-State. I can beat the Longhorns by 25 points at halftime on Sony PlayStation's NCAA Football '99, even without Frank Murphy Jr. I'm saying 59-10, one point shy of doubling the spread. My pick: K-State to cover. Ife's pick: K-State to cover.

2. Missouri +25.5 at Ohio State. The only thing more beautiful than Jennifer Lopez on the MTV Video Music Awards last week is how poorly the Big 10 has been performing so far this season. Oh, wait ... I'd better put my fiancée on that list, or I won't live to write another column. My pick: Missouri to cover. Ife's pick: Missouri to cover.

3. Texas A&M -3.5 at Southern Mississippi. I'll be honest. I don't know a single thing about Southern Mississippi. I like the Aggies, though. Besides, I've got to go with a Big 12 team, unless, of course, it's that one school near Oklahoma City or that other school in Larry. My pick: Texas A&M to cover. Ife's pick: Texas A&M to cover.

4. Indiana +19.5 at Kentucky. My fearless prediction of the week: 575 yards passing and six touchdowns for Tim Couch, although that's really not even stretching it. One thought, though: Why are sportswriters complaining about K-State quarterback Michael Bishop's schedule during his run at the Heisman while they praise Couch's performance against Eastern Kentucky? My pick: Kentucky to cover. Ife's pick: Kentucky to cover.

5. LSU -7 at Auburn. My other fearless prediction of the week: LSU will be the SEC champions come December, although that's not really stretching it, either. My pick: LSU to cover. Ife's pick: LSU to cover.

6. Mississippi State +2.5 at Oklahoma State. This game is Oklahoma State's home opener after two on the road, and it follows an embarrassing loss to intrastate-rival Tulsa.

It's bounce-back time. My pick: Oklahoma State to cover. Ife's pick: Oklahoma State to cover.

7. Fresno State +11.5 at Texas Tech. I'm gonna guess that Fresno State's performance at Colorado last week said more about the Buffaloes than the Bulldogs. My pick: Texas Tech to cover. Ife's pick: Texas Tech to cover.

8. North Carolina State -6 at Baylor. Let me get this straight: the team that just beat Florida State by less than a touchdown over Baylor? My pick: NC State to cover. Ife's pick: NC State to cover.

9. Florida -4.5 at Tennessee. Someday? Yes. Saturday? No. Tee Martin will get there for the Vols, but not this week against a Stoops-coordinated defense. My pick: Florida to cover. Ife's pick: Florida to cover.

10. California -3.5 at Oklahoma. Cal hung with Nebraska last week. Oklahoma barely beat TCU. Besides, I hate Oklahoma. My pick: Cal to cover. Ife's pick: Cal to cover.

11. Utah State +22 at Colorado. I don't think the Buffs will lose, but I think they're headed down the same path Oklahoma has taken in the better part of the past decade. My pick: Utah State to cover. Ife's pick: Colorado to cover.

Energetic, urban hardcore band pleases screaming fans at Wareham

BY JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A nearly full Wareham Opera House shook Tuesday night with the sounds of national ska act the Urge.

When the Urge took the stage at 10:45, even those on the sidelines couldn't keep still.

Originally from St. Louis, the Urge has toured with such national acts as 311, Fishbone and Korn and has yet to play a dull show.

Manhattan has seen a lot in the past few years of this ska/punk band referred to as "urban hardcore," who once played at the old Bomber's in Aggieville.

Steve Ewing, the Urge's lead vocalist, managed to stay energetic for an hour and a half of stage time, working his way through the oft-played "Jump Right In," the almost-love song "Closer," and a frantic version of "Straight to Hell," among others. The always popular "Gettin' Hectic" rounded off the show and featured a wild form of audience participation.

"I don't even know how many times I've seen these guys, but they never get old," said Somer Patterson, junior in English. "It's always a better show every time."

The most celebrated of the Urge's songs were selections from its first compact disc, "Receiving the Gift of Flavor," including "Brainless," the group's first radio hit. The audience might have been small, but everyone there was truly a fan; even the most obscure songs had the crowd singing along.

The Urge appeared Wednesday night in Wichita and begins its West Coast tour on Saturday.

The show had a late start with the 2 Skinnee J's, a band with so many members that it crowded the small Wareham stage. After success with many smaller projects, 2 Skinnee J's is promoting the release of its first CD on a big-name label, "¡Super! Mercado." J. Guevara, the band's vocalist, said opening for the Urge always means a great crowd.

"We've played a lot of shows with the Urge over the past few years, and we love it," Guevara said. "Since they're from the Midwest, playing a show here means that we're going to get a group that truly loves our kind of music."

Paw, a band from Lawrence, followed 2 Skinnee J's with a play list of almost punkish origin. The band, made up of former University of Kansas students, now spends a lot of time recording at a farm just outside of Lawrence.

Tracks from Paw's CD, "Dragline," released in 1993, and the new "Death to Traitors," kept crowd surfers and stage divers busy.

Hole strikes gold 'Celebrity Skin' one of year's most powerful recordings

Music Review
★★★★ out of 5

BY JEFF ELLIOTT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hole lead singer/songwriter Courtney Love finally realized that she didn't have all the answers.

Love needed someone to help save her band's new compact disc from becoming another modern-rock tragedy, so she summoned Smashing Pumpkins front man Billy Corgan for her band's third release, "Celebrity Skin."

Even though Love claimed to have written all of the lyrics on the album, Corgan wrote the music for five of the 12 songs, and he transformed Hole's sound into something majestic and beautiful, much like Love's physical makeover.

No longer does the band produce a guitar scream-fest backed by Love's "widow-of-Kurt" vocals.

Instead, Corgan leads the band down a path that he has traveled many times.

On "Celebrity Skin," Hole slows things down and delivers an emotional performance much like Smashing Pumpkins did on its 1995 release, "Melancholy and the Infinite Sadness."

On the title track, Love preaches about the emptiness when the thrill of Hollywood stardom fades. One only can assume that Love, a former grunge queen, is singing about herself on lines such as:

"When I wake up in my makeup, it's too early for that dress/wilted and faded somewhere in Hollywood/I'm glad I came here with your pound of flesh ...you better watch out what you wish for/it better be worth it/so much to die for."

"Malibu," written by Corgan, is reminiscent of the Pumpkins' sound featuring lyrics such as: "Get well soon, please don't go any higher/how are you so burnt when you're barely on fire?/cry to the angels, I'm gonna rescue you/I'm gonna set you free tonight."

These lyrics lead a listener to believe that Love is singing about her late husband, former Nirvana front man Kurt Cobain, who ended his life in a fit of heroin and depression with a self-inflicted gunshot wound in early 1994.

"Dying," also written by Corgan, might be Hole's version of the Pumpkins' "Disarm." Its slow, rhythmic guitar riffs mixed with dark, depressing lyrics make it one of the album's highlights.

Every track on "Celebrity Skin" is listener-friendly. It is one of the most solid modern-rock albums to surface in a long time.

This, combined with the controversy surrounding the dispute between Love and Corgan (who are no longer speaking to one another) regarding credit for the album, makes "Celebrity Skin" a front-runner for the best album of 1998.

OPUS Live Band Competition brings local music to campus to earn cash prizes

BY SARAH FLORIE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For 11 years, the OPUS 12 Live Band Competition has showcased Manhattan's local music talent. The 12th year promises to be no different.

The Union Program Council's Eclectic Entertainment committee and KMKF-FM 101.5, will present the 12th annual OPUS Live Band Competition on Friday at 5 p.m. in the free-speech zone.

Seven Manhattan bands, each of whom paid a $40 entry fee, will be battling it out at this year's competition. Each band will play a 20-minute set, and five judges will score each in numerous categories. The winning band will take home $400, second prize is $250, and third is $150.

Alex Stucky, UPC Eclectic Entertainment chairman, said that most of the bands in the competition can be classified in alternative rock and funk categories.

This year's event is outdoors, which Stucky said should boost the student turnout.

"In the past when we've had it outside, we've had better turnouts," Stucky said. "We had it inside last year, and our turnout wasn't as good."

Thanks to events such as OPUS, local bands have an opportunity to perform in front of fellow students and peers, in addition to earning extra cash. In the past few years, some bands have established themselves in Manhattan after having these opportunities.

This also provides a way for those not yet familiar with any of the bands to experience the "Manhattan sound," Stucky said.

The Pi Kaps are "pole sitting" this week in order to raise money and awareness for PUSH America, an organization that serves people with disabilities. The pole sitting began at 7 a.m. Monday and will continue until around 4 p.m. Friday. Donations to PUSH America are being taken all week at a table in front of the pole. There also is a competition for sorority houses to see which house can raise the most money. The winning house receives a trophy and breakfast cooked by the men of Pi Kappa Phi.

Clinton told 'essential truth' about Lewinsky affair

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton said Wednesday he told "the essential truth" about his affair with Monica Lewinsky but declined to discuss her graphic account. Asked whether he might resign, he responded that Americans "want me to go on."

"The right thing for our country and the right thing for all people concerned is not to get mired in all the details here," Clinton said.

Congress, however, is plunging ahead toward possible impeachment proceedings and the release of thousands of pages of sexually-explicit material. The House may vote this week to release Clinton's videotaped grand-jury testimony that reportedly shows an angry, defiant president struggling with questions about Lewinsky.

Although the president did not respond directly when asked whether he might resign under any circumstances, spokesman Mike McCurry said the answer was no.

CLINTON

Clinton spoke at his first news conference since Friday's release of the report by Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr that accuses the president of perjury, obstruction of justice and abuse of power in trying to cover up his affair.

The news conference, with visiting President Vaclav Havel of the Czech Republic, was in a State Department auditorium where hundreds of administration employees applauded Clinton's answers.

Havel reflected the bewilderment of many people around the world that Clinton is in such trouble about an affair. The Czech president said he didn't understand some things about the United States, but he would remain Clinton's friend, whether or not Clinton were president.

Leading Democrats have complained that Clinton and his lawyers have been splitting legal hairs about whether the president committed perjury by denying last January in a civil lawsuit that he had a sexual relationship with Lewinsky, relying on a narrow definition of sex, and again in his grand-jury testimony last month.

Asked if Lewinsky's account was truthful and accurate and whether he still maintained he had not lied, Clinton referred back to Friday's prayer breakfast at the White House where he said he had sinned and repented. "I laid out as carefully and as brutally honestly as I could what I believed the essential truth to be."

Clinton refused to answer that question — or others about the Lewinsky affair — directly, talking instead about the challenges facing the nation and the business that needs to be done.

Asked if he had lost the moral authority to lead the nation or conduct foreign policy, Clinton asserted, "I have never stopped leading this country in foreign affairs in this entire year, and I never will."

Moral authority "is something that you have to demonstrate every day," he said.

"My opinion is not as important as the opinion of others. What is important is that I do my job."

"I am trying to do the still quite-painful work that I need to do with my family in our own life," he said. "And I'm determined to lead this country and to focus on the issues that are before us."

McCurry said Clinton's lack of direct answers was intentional. "He wanted to convey one thing: that he was not going to dwell endlessly on the Lewinsky matter. He wanted to make it clear he is responsible for doing the people's business."

Clinton's only response on the resignation question was to say, "The personal toll on me is of no concern except insofar as it affects my personal life. ... And I feel, though pain, better now because I'm working on what I should be working on."

The president said the expected release of his videotaped testimony was "not of so much concern to me." He said he had thought it would come out, even though grand-jury testimony traditionally is not released.

Committee reviews possible changes in abortion bill

By CARL MANNING
The Associated Press

TOPEKA — An architect of the state's new abortion law said Wednesday that legislators should consider rewriting or removing a section dealing with a specific late-term procedure, because he feels it isn't needed.

The law, signed in April by Gov. Bill Graves, prohibits abortions of viable fetuses after 22 weeks' gestation, including those with severe, life-threatening abnormalities and deformities.

Such abortions are allowed only when a woman's life is at risk or when the pregnancy would cause "a substantial and irreversible impairment of a major bodily function" to the woman.

Another part, Section 18, bans a procedure the law calls "partial-birth" abortions, unless two physicians say that it's necessary to save a mother's life, or the pregnancy would cause "a substantial and irreversible impairment of a major physical or mental function of the woman."

"My thought is to go into Section 18 either to repeal it or redefine it," said Rep. Tim Carmody, R-Overland Park, after a meeting of a special judiciary committee. Carmody is chairman of that committee.

The committee is considering which — if any — changes it wants to recommend to the Legislature, which convenes in January.

"If we need to make changes, we are going to recommend it," said Carmody, who helped write the legislation. "I think Section 18 is superfluous. It's not needed. We already ban abortions of a viable fetus."

Carmody said the "partial-birth" language was added at the insistence of lawmakers who felt it was needed. Many hoped that such a ban would shut down Dr. George Tiller, who performs late-term abortions at his Wichita clinic.

Tiller filed a lawsuit with the Kansas Supreme Court challenging some sections of the law but not the "partial birth" section. The court hasn't decided whether to hear the case.

In July, Tiller's clinic said it performed "partial-birth" abortions generating complaints from legislators wno said the law didn't intend to allow the procedure. Tiller says he hasn't violated the law.

The law defines "partial-birth" abortion as a procedure that "includes the deliberate and intentional evacuation of all or a part of the intracranial contents of a viable fetus prior to removal of such otherwise intact fetus from the body of the pregnant woman."

But Tiller's clinic disclosed in July that the method it used was different from the intact dilation and evacuation method typically thought of as "partial-birth" abortion. It said Tiller uses a full cranial anesthesia, which causes fetal death first, then induces labor so the baby is delivered stillborn.

"It's possible to kill the baby before labor, and I believe that is what Dr. Tiller does: kill the baby and then induce labor," Dr. Eugene Pearce told the committee.

Pearce is section chief of gynecologic services at Truman Medical Center in Kansas City, Mo., the University of Missouri School of Medicine's main teaching hospital.

Pearce said that medical data shows "partial-birth" abortions aren't necessary to save a mother's life. Carmody said the statement is a good reason to strike the section from the law.

RETAILERS

But retailers are interested in Manhattan because of potential customers from K-State and Fort Riley. The owners of Town Center's building, Forest City Enterprises, have a leasing team in Cleveland that presents Manhattan to retailers as a potential gold mine.

"We show them what a jewel it is," Carlson said.

The mall has seven vacancies out of 70 available spots. That's lower than many other larger markets, Carlson said.

Space problems have hampered the growth process in Manhattan in the past.

"There's been a lack of vacant commercial land, which made it difficult for businesses," Assistant Director for Planning Eric Cattell said.

Town Center's subleasing of its "outlots" has made the construction of Chili's possible as well as space for other interested merchants.

Ann Harts, vice president of the Chamber of Commerce and director of economic development, said there is a limited supply of land available for development, but the future for Manhattan is very exciting.

The Chamber of Commerce assists retailers with information necessary for them to make informed decisions about coming to Manhattan.

"In the past several years, due to proactive leadership, we've had some impressive announcements of new retail," Harts said.

Manhattan residents probably can expect to see more of those announcements in Manhattan's near future although Harts would not comment on what those might be.

"We have numerous well-known retailers who are looking at Manhattan right now," Harts said. "Retailers have a desire to come to Manhattan, because they see a good opportunity."

Other locally-owned stores have opened as well. A new formal-wear shop, a home furnishing store and hair salon are among the new arrivals to Manhattan's downtown district.

Airport main runway to 11,000 feet, with expansion of the ramp areas as well.

Andy Atchison, director of logistics in the transportation division at Fort Riley, served on the committee and said the airport is currently too small to handle military aircraft in case troops need to be deployed.

"We would still be effective in deploying troops, but the only problem is that our troops would be deploying out of Forbes Field in Topeka," Atchison said.

He said it would be much more convenient to deploy out of Manhattan rather than driving more than an hour to Topeka or Salina, which serves as the secondary site of deployment.

"With improvements to the Manhattan airport, it would give us a better deployment rate, because it could handle larger air crafts," Atchison said.

As a result of possible expansion of the airport, Kansas Highway 18 would need to be realigned.

Improved access to Fort Riley's rail head, an interchange to Ogden and Wildcat Creek Road, and an interchange at Scenic Drive also are part of the proposal. Furthermore, necessary improvements to meet increased traffic and to prevent flooding at Ogden were submitted.

Finally, the group looked at possibly using the Fort Riley rail head for civilian use as well.

"Currently, Manhattan doesn't have a rail facility for freight, especially to serve the industrial park," Atchison said. "It is something brand new, but there's a lot of liability there as well."

Colantone said the growth options the committee recommended are twofold.

"It's not only for economic development but for the safety of citizens of Manhattan and Riley County as well as for visitors that come into our community," Colantone said.

ment.

"We'd like to at least be in the middle; right now, we're not much bigger than Wichita State, in terms of volume numbers," she said.

McCulloh said this was a good example of how to tie in academics with athletics.

"It's really good to always tie in the academic side of the university. It's a good way to remind people of the different missions the university has," she said.

McCulloh said Snyder has always done a good job of doing just that.

"I can't stress enough what wonderful support Bill Snyder has been," she said. "His support has shown that academics and athletics can really work together."

PARKING

"We're looking for a more immediate solution," he said.

Many of the K-State issues have a connection to campus parking.

Swenson said growth in the student population as well as the university's commitment to maintaining an academic core on campus are putting pressure on the limited number of parking spaces available.

The university wants to maintain it's central core of academic buildings rather than creating off-campus class sites for a large number of classes, Swenson said.

Maintaining that core means future buildings will be built on sites that are parking lots now.

One committee member said the situation is already strained.

"A lot of our staff call their parking permits hunting permits because they have to hunt for parking," said Connie Kissee, library assistant and steering-committee member.

Kissee said early feedback indicated a shuttle system may be part of the answer. Swenson also raised the possibility of some form of public transportation serving both the city and campus.

"There is a lot of interest in the city as a whole for pubic transportation," he said.

Ted Rieck, an associate with TranSystems, said a public bus or shuttle system would work well for the campus community.

It could also be integrated with a bicycle system.

Rieck said other communities have buses with bicycle racks on them so customers can use them for longer trips and still have their bicycles with them.

"If the bus doesn't quite get to where you live, you can bike to the stop, put the bike on the rack and ride the bus to the campus," he said. Rieck said Johnson County and the University of Michigan both use a bus/bicycle system.

However, Abbott said he needed to be certain students would use a shuttle system before committing money to set it up on campus.

If a campus shuttle were adopted, students would park away from campus and ride to various stops along a specified route.

Abbott said this would be a significant change for commuting students. Whether or not students would be willing to use the system would be a key factor in the decision.

"If nobody will use it, then I'd be a fool to build a shuttle system," Abbott said.

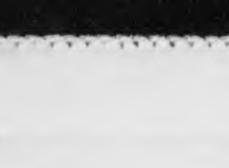
determine what items should be placed on the agenda? Stovall said the law applies only to members themselves, and "purely procedural issues" are not subject to the law, because they do not constitute "substantive business or affairs of the body."

—Can a staff member brief all board members on an issue, elicit comment and discuss a board members' concerns about that issue, if the staff member discusses it with other members? Again, Stovall said discussions covered by the act apply only to those involving members of the public body.

"The only caveat we would add is that this procedure should never be used to take binding action," Stovall wrote.



McKenzie said, "Some of the questions asked and answered provide additional guidance to local officials on how to handle specific situations. One of the concerns over the original opinion was that it seemed to imply that unintentional communications could violate the act.

"I think it's clear in this opinion that there has to be an effort to orchestrate serial communications for it to be a violation. We agree with that."

MIT fraternity indicted for manslaughter, hazing

By KAREN RUSSO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — Prosecutors took the extraordinary step Thursday of charging a fraternity from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology — the organization, not its members — with manslaughter in the case of a student who drank himself to death at a party a year ago.

The case against the MIT chapter of Phi Gamma Delta is believed to be the first in the nation in which a fraternity has been charged with homicide, District Attorney Ralph Martin said.

The fraternity was indicted on charges of manslaughter and hazing in the death of Scott Krueger, an 18-year-old student who fell into a coma last September after a drinking binge at the MIT fraternity to which he was pledging in Boston's Fenway neighborhood.

No individual fraternity members will face charges, not even those who bought the alcohol.

Manslaughter is normally punishable by a $1,000 fine and a year and a half in jail; hazing carries a $3,000 fine and a year and a half behind bars. Because there is no way to put an organization behind bars, the most the fraternity faces is a fine.

"My office determined that the indictments should be aimed at the fraternity that promoted and orchestrated the activities that ultimately led to Scott Krueger's death, not at the people who were sent on a purchasing errand," Martin said.

Officers at the Phi Gamma Delta national headquarters in Lexington, Ky., were not available for comment, a staffer said.

OUR OPINION

The fraternity chapter was shut down after Krueger's death. He was found in a coma Sept. 27 in the basement room where he was living and died two days later. His mother said fraternity members told him he had to drink a certain amount of alcohol before he could leave their party.

In other cases around the country involving fraternity drinking deaths, individuals have been charged with homicide, but the fraternities themselves have usually faced charges involving only alcohol violations.

Krueger's parents, Bob and Darlene Krueger, said the indictment puts the responsibility on those who should pay for their son's death: the organization that sanctioned the partying.

The couple said they might also sue MIT as well as the fraternity. Darlene Krueger accused the school of leading the couple to believe that on-campus housing was provided for all freshmen. She said many freshmen end up in fraternities days after their arrival on campus.

"We entrusted MIT with our son, and they failed us miserably," she said.

"If such a death could occur at MIT, it could happen anywhere," said Rosalind Williams, MIT's dean of students and undergraduate education. "Dangerous drinking is a problem that needs to be addressed on many fronts and by all concerned."

MIT recently announced that all freshmen starting in 2001 will be required to live in campus residence halls.

In August, a Sigma Alpha Epsilon chapter at Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge pleaded no contest to purchasing alcohol for underage drinkers and agreed to pay $22,600 in a plea bargain over the drinking death of a 20-year-old pledge.

After a freshman at Frostburg State University in Cumberland, Md., drank himself to death at a fraternity party, eight people were fined $1,000 each and placed on five years' probation last November for selling alcohol without a license. Manslaughter and reckless-endangerment charges against the eight were dropped.

Policies for K-State remain unchanged

K-State Interfraternity Council members said university policies haven't changed since last year's nationwide binge-drinking deaths.

Jason Heinrich, vice president of internal affairs, said incidents involving binge drinking and fraternities look bad for all greek chapters.

"Any time a situation like that occurs, it is a bad image for every chapter, not just the chapter it happened to," Heinrich said.

Greek Affairs adviser Barb Robel said she

Committee undecided on releasing videotape

By DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The House Judiciary Committee delayed a decision Thursday on releasing President Clinton's videotaped grand-jury testimony after becoming entangled in a partisan dispute over how much more sexually-explicit written evidence to release.

The delay came as top House Republicans demanded an FBI inquiry into an alleged "systematic attempt to intimidate" the panel's chairman and other lawmakers, and the agency pledged to take "appropriate steps" in response.

CLINTON

Several members of the Judiciary Committee, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the panel had not even begun a debate over the question of the release of the tape. Instead, they said, the day was devoted to discussing what material should be deleted from the thousands of pages of written evidence as part of an effort to shield the public from sexually-explicit material and protect the reputation of innocent people.

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., the panel's chairman, said a series of party-line votes was taken during the day. He added: "We're partisan, sure. It was strongly partisan, vigorously partisan. I prefer that it would go more smoothly."

The panel will meet again on Friday.

Several sources in both parties, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Democrats had tried at several points to force the removal of explicit-sexual material from records to be released, but on all such occasions, Republicans had overruled them. The two sides clashed, for example, over whether to release portions of Monica Lewinsky's grand-jury testimony that went into great detail about her recollections of specific sex acts and sexually-explicit telephone conversations, these sources said.

Even as the panel wrangled over Starr's material, a fresh dispute broke out over Hyde's decision to seek a copy of Clinton's videotaped deposition in Paula Jones' sexual-harassment lawsuit. Hyde sent a letter, signed only by himself, to Judge Susan Webber Wright asking for the tape and later told reporters he expects it ultimately will be made public.

His request drew an angry complaint from the panel's senior Democrat, Rep. John Conyers, who wrote the chairman that it was "misleading to state" that the entire committee was making the request when he had not been informed.

In a separate development, White House sources disclosed that former Rep. Pat Williams, D-Mont., was joining Clinton's staff to help solidify the president's support among House Democrats.

Democrats on the panel also had favored a delay in the release of the tape, but most Republicans favor its immediate distribution, a point underscored when Speaker Newt Gingrich spoke before the closed-door party caucus on Wednesday.

Before the committee broke up for the evening, senior Republican aides had confidently been making preparations for release of the tape as early as today.

Even before the committee began meeting, TV outlets were making plans for airing a four-hour tape said to contain images of a president who was defiant, angry and evasive by turns as he fielded explicit questions from Starr's prosecutors last month.

The committee met as the political fallout continued in the House over publication of an article detailing an extramarital affair by Hyde, the committee chairman, more than 30 years ago.

Licensing company to search for counterfeit K-State goods

By JOE HURLA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Renewed interest in K-State athletics might have lead to counterfeit K-State merchandise being sold in Manhattan, a representative from the Collegiate Licensing Company said.

Jennifer Larson, University Services Assistant for CLC, the company that licenses K-State merchandise, said representatives from the company will be in Manhattan this weekend searching for counterfeit goods.

"We're going to survey the marketplace and make sure no illegal merchandise is being sold," Larson said.

John Fairman, director of licensing for K-State, said the presence of CLC might be an indication that K-State's football team has become one of the nation's elite.

"Traditionally, the University of Michigan and other big football schools will have people selling items in the parking lot out of their trunks or off of carts," Fairman said. "We haven't had any problems with this yet."

Although Fairman said he didn't expect to find many illegal items, this weekend still would be important in the fight against unlicensed merchandise.

"They (vendors) want to get a better feel for our location," Fairman said. "It's more of a trial run for what they anticipate at the Nebraska game."

The looming Nebraska game doesn't bother Leah Sobba, apparel and gifts manager for Varney's Book Store. Sobba said the precautions she takes should prevent illegal items from finding their way into her store.

"I only deal with licensed vendors," Sobba said. "I won't even see any non-licensed vendors. But just to be safe, we check to see that things are trademarked when they come in."

Sobba said despite her precautions, Varney's had one incident involving unlicensed merchandise.

"We had one situation two years ago with a photo of the stadium," Sobba said. "There were questions about if it was properly trademarked, so we had to pull all of them off the shelves."

Because of this incident, Sobba said she was sure there could be other instances of illegal merchandise circulating somewhere in the city.

"I'm sure there are some people out there who are selling untrademarked items, but I don't think most of them are doing it intentionally," Sobba said.

Sobba said she often has to explain the copyright laws to people.

"I get calls from people who have ideas for shirts they want to have made who don't understand the laws," Sobba said.

Larson said she expects to encounter mostly peo-

Board of Regents approves final plans for expansion

By MATT KREPS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Kansas Board of Regents approved the final plans for expansion of KSU Stadium on Wednesday, paving the way for construction on the project to begin in November.

The $12.8 million expansion will add luxury suites and other seating options to the east side of the stadium, raising the capacity to 46,000. Other improvements will include restroom expansion, concessions and parking facilities to accommodate the increased seating.

The project will be financed by revenue bonds to be repaid by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

The bond repayment will be funded through revenue generated by ticket sales from the new seats, said Bob Cavello, assistant athletic director for business operations.

Construction is planned to begin immediately following the Nov. 14 game against Nebraska and will be completed by August 1999 for next year's season.

"We're ready to get it built when we leave the field victorious after beating Nebraska," said Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and university architect.

"We absolutely, positively have to be ready by the start of next season's schedule."

Carter said the next step is to open the project to bids from contractors and write contracts. He said this part of the process should proceed rapidly as a large number of firms will be interested in bidding.

"I don't think we'll have any problems getting bids. We should be able to have an expedited bidding process," Carter said.

Cavello said the expansion process has been a smooth one. He said university, state, regents and athletic administrators are working together to create a continuous flow of information to help speed the proposal through the approval process. Officials at the regents level are supportive of the plan, he said.

"This has really been a smooth process," Cavello said.

Hughes grant to help biological education

K-State has received a $1.8 million grant from the Howard Hughes Medical Institute for undergraduate biological education. The four-year grant will include improvements in biology classes. K-State was one of 58 out of 191 schools to receive a grant.

James Guikema, interim associate dean of biology and a member of the committee that submitted the proposal to HHMI, said the grant will be beneficial to the university.

"It's going to impact the university by enhancing the level of biology education at K-State," he said.

The Howard Hughes Medical Institute focuses on biomedical research and has awarded grants in this program since 1988.

Brian Spooner, professor and director of the Division of Biology, said funds will affect areas such as access to research experience, faculty development, curricular development, classroom improvement, teaching laboratory equipment and education of high school science teachers. All funds are for undergraduate biological science.

Beth Montelone, associate professor of biology and a member of the proposal committee, said the grant will help the faculty and students.

"It is going to mean we can do our job more effectively," she said.

Montelone is on the executive committee that will oversee research scholars in the genetics curriculum.

K-State received a $1.2 million grant from HHMI in 1992. Montelone said the past grant money was used to hire a coordinator to provide pre-health students with a mentor program, provide workshops for high school teachers and provide five scholarships for a summer research project.

Enrollment increases; more faculty needed

The College of Business and Administration rapidly is becoming one of the largest colleges at K-State and is looking to hire additional staff over the next three years in order to maintain its high quality of instruction, Dean Yar Ebadi said.

The college has 130 graduate students and nearly 2,600 undergraduates, with only 55 full-time equivalent faculty to attend to the growing classes.

With concerns about an increase in students and a lack of faculty over the next three years, Ebadi met with K-State President Jon Wefald and the Dean's Council to discuss the problem.

The original solution was to cap the number of students allowed to declare a business-related major each year. However, Ebadi said, this only will be a last resort.

"That is certainly not the step that we want to take," he said. "We want to find some other way."

Instead, over the next three years, the College of Business and Administration is hoping to hire more faculty to allow for the increase in students and continue a program with interactive class sizes.

"The quality of the program is the focus," Ebadi said.

He also said students are now happy with their classes. The increase in students and class sizes is expected to shift over time after the majority of this year's business majors have graduated.

Ebadi said he is positive about the program, its students and faculty. He said he believes the increase in the number of students is a sign of quality education.

"We have outstanding students and that speaks highly of our program," he said.

4 left in final running for WSU presidency

HAYS, Kan. — The Kansas Board of Regents made public on Thursday the names of four finalists for the presidency of Wichita State University.

The finalists are as follows:

Joel Anderson, provost and vice chancellor of academic affairs at the University of Arkansas-Little Rock since 1984. Anderson served as interim chancellor in 1993 and has been a professor of political science and dean of the graduate school during his 28-year career at Little Rock.

Donald Beggs, chancellor of Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Ill., since 1996. Beggs served for 15 years as dean of the College of Education and has taught at Southern Illinois since 1972.

Judy Hemple, senior vice president for academic affairs at the University of Toledo, Ohio. Hemple has been on the Toledo faculty since 1993 and was dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at Indiana State University and director of general education at Emporia State University.

Nicholas Henry, former president of Georgia Southern University in Statesboro, Ga. Henry served on the faculties at Indiana State, University of New Mexico, University of Georgia and Arizona State University before serving for 11 years as Georgia Southern's president.

The four candidates will be interviewed by the regents on the Wichita State campus on Oct. 2 and 3.

Following those interviews, the board plans to announce the university's new president within five days. These dates were disclosed during the regents' regular monthly meeting at Fort Hays State University.

The names of the candidates were forwarded to the regents by a 16-member search committee, which recommended them from an original field of 83 applicants.

In another personnel-related matter, the regents heard a report from a representative of a Chicago executive-search firm that will seek candidates to fill the regent's executive-director position.

Steve Jordan was executive director until the end of June, when he resigned to become the president of Eastern Washington University in Cheney, Wash.

Tom Bryant, on leave from Pittsburg State University. is serving as interim executive director.

The board also amended its fiscal year 2000 budget to increase the state's financial aid programs — $1 million more for the Comprehensive Grant Program and $50,000 for the Vocational Scholarship Program.

Global financial crisis increases trade deficit

WASHINGTON, D.C. — America's trade deficit climbed to $13.9 billion as the global financial crisis cut deeper into sales by American farmers and factories, pushing exports down for a fourth-straight month.

While the Clinton administration urged joint efforts to ward off a worldwide recession, financial markets tumbled in disappointment Thursday, the day after Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan squelched hopes of coordinated interest-rate reductions among leading countries.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 216.01 points to close at 7,873.77, pushing it back below where it started at the beginning of the year. The 2.7-percent plunge in the Dow followed a 2.4-percent fall in Tokyo's main stock index, which dropped to a 12-year low.

CORRECTION

Due to a production error, a compact disc review was rated incorrectly in Thursday's paper. Hole's new album, "Celebrity Skin," should have received five out of a possible five stars. The Collegian regrets the error.

Dean known in college as true leader, visionary

BY JAMI STUMP
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Editor's Note: This the fifth story in the Collegian's "Meet Your Dean" series.

"Everything that Terry King has done has helped people visualize where we are headed in the College of Engineering," said Tom Roberts, assistant dean of the College of Engineering. "It is important that good leaders create vision, and he has done that for the college."

KING

After completing his first year as dean of the second-largest college at K-State, King said he has evaluated the future of the engineering college.

"The College of Engineering is an outstanding educational program," King said." We have great faculty members and superb students. What we need is to be visible and continue to gain national prominence with the solid base we have already obtained by the reputation of our faculty and students."

One of the first steps King took to evaluate the college was the designing of a plan, "Engineering Education for the 21st Century," to create the best possible engineering education for the 21st century.

The strategic plan outlines three fundamental ideas that shape the education.

The first idea is to be practice-oriented while firmly rooted in fundamentals. The college must create an environment in which engineers can train by looking over the shoulders of experienced engineers or professors while being instructed and doing real engineering activities.

"Engineers are in a practice business. They have to have the ability to do and understand things," King said.

The second idea focuses on a learning-based education.

"All education needs to focus on the learner and not the teacher," King said.

The last idea is for the college to be integrative and holistic. This idea focuses on the importance of academic research and its integration into industry.

"Academic research is a major driver in industry today," King said. "As engineers, we always want to get new ideas out there and put them into practice."

OUR VIEW

Fraternity rightfully being held responsible

It is difficult not to sound preachy when discussing alcohol abuse.

Unfortunately, however, we again are reminded of the dangers of binge drinking.

Last September, an 18-year-old student at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology drank himself to death at a fraternity party. He was found in a basement room on Sept. 27, 1997, in a coma, and he died two days later. Fraternity members involved apparently were forcing people to drink a certain amount of alcohol before they were permitted to leave the party. It is unclear whether the amount was anywhere near the volume required to drive a person into coma but judging by the survival rate of other pledges, the amount of drinking required was probably minimal.

Nevertheless, the fraternity chapter at MIT was closed. Members do not face charges as individuals; the organization, however, does.

Showing a degree of creativity, prosecutors in Boston took steps to charge the fraternity with manslaughter — not any one fraternity member but the group as a whole. Although there have been a number of drinking deaths on college campuses, both related and unrelated to greek activities, this marks the first time an organization has been tried for homicide. In the past, the response to a drinking tragedy was typically to hold several people directly accountable, while the organization involved, if any, would remain unsanctioned.

In a way, the decision in Boston makes a statement about the crime itself, that the fault did not lie with just one or two students, with an adviser, with the president of the fraternity or with the national office. Rather, this event seems to send a clear message that sometimes individuals aren't to blame. Sometimes the fault lies in the system as a whole.

The system in question is not limited to greeks; rather, it is the system and environment that exists on college campuses.

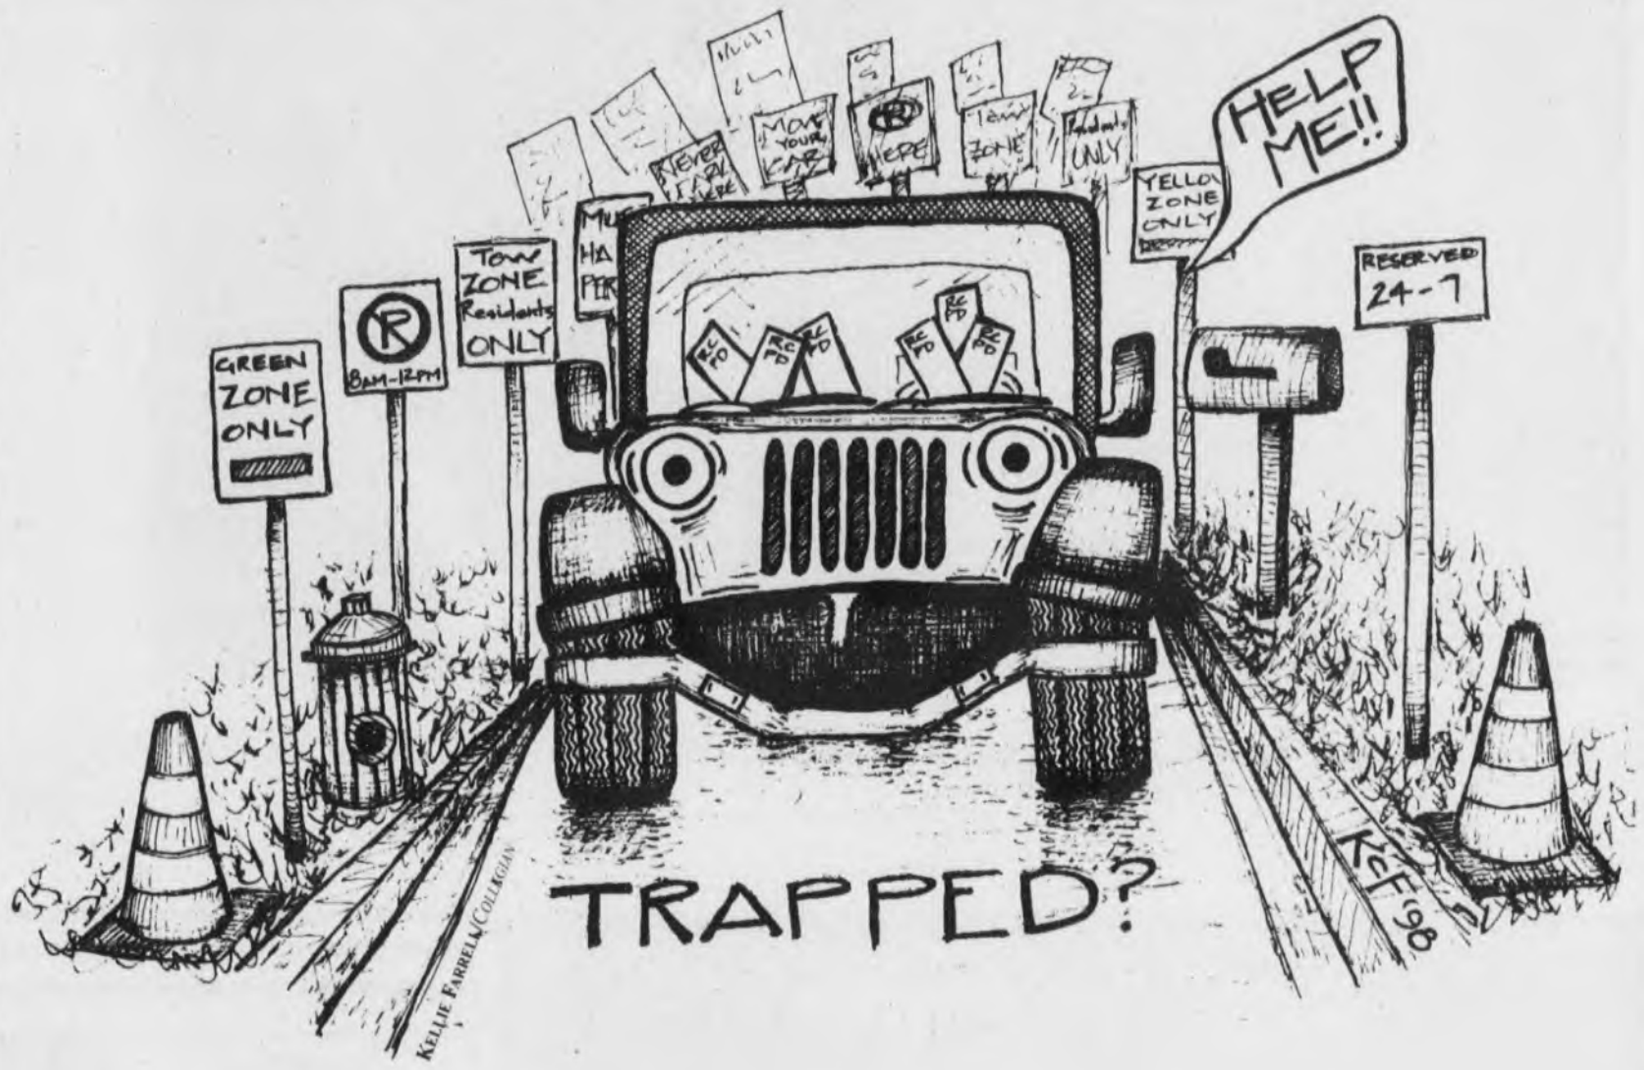
It is an environment that leads people to believe that binge drinking is cool. It is an environment that makes us run and get a magic marker when we come across someone who has passed out from ingesting too much alcohol. It is an environment in which we help our friends when they are too inebriated to stand, and once we've gotten them tucked away, we go and rejoin the party. It is an environment in which we cannot find anything fun to do that doesn't involve alcohol.

Men feel pressured to drink because, it might help their confidence level while dealing with women. They feel pressured to binge drink because it gives them bragging rights or makes them the center of attention. Women feel pressured to drink because they might think it will make them more assertive toward men. You drink to have fun, to celebrate, to do things you wouldn't do sober.

It isn't necessarily peer pressure that causes people to make poor decisions. Peer pressure implies an external influence. Sometimes we pay too much attention to myths about college life and the image we are supposed to project about ourselves.

Freshmen make this mistake most frequently, and that is because there simply are not enough people out there trying to teach them the truth about drinking and how dangerous it potentially can be. Freshmen need to be prepared early for what they will be up against. They need to be told during summer, before they spend the first week moving in and getting wasted every night. Expecting freshmen to party the entire week before classes and then to buckle down and study the rest of the semester is ludicrous.

We each need to be more responsible, for ourselves and others. We need to know our alcohol limit, and we need to know it without exploring. We need to listen to others when they tell us we have had too much. We need to start realizing that something bad could happen as a result of alcohol abuse, or we will find out firsthand the hard way. It is a huge responsibility, and it could save someone's life.



Certainly, the young man who died at MIT was pressured to drink. The fraternity in question is being held accountable. It should be.

It should serve as a wake-up call, and it should scare you. There has not been a death related to binge drinking at K-State recently, but that has nothing to do with a Social Responsibility Committee or Alcohol and Beverage Control.

We have been lucky.

Our tendency is to let younger, less experienced drinkers learn from their own mistakes, and in the end, it's all another turn on the roulette wheel.

BEWARE OF THE TRAFFIC NAZIS

Confusion over no-parking zone leaves columnist, police at odds

VIEWPOINT

MICHAEL NEFF

Beware those of you who reside on LeGore Lane. The Traffic Nazis are on the prowl.

That's the affectionate nickname my roommate came up with for the Riley County Police Department after the latest round of parking tickets was issued on LeGore Lane. Those who live there ought to know what I'm talking about, having seen at least three rounds of tickets issued to the block in the past four days.

You see, you aren't allowed to park on LeGore Lane between 8 a.m. and noon. Why? I haven't the slightest idea, but when I called the RCPD/Traffic Nazis to complain, they told me it was because they wanted to keep students living in the residence halls from taking up all our parking.

So, they can't park there, but neither can I. In front of my own house. Not in front of a fire hydrant or a mailbox. Normally not in a yellow zone. Which brings up another thing. The person who lived in this house before me painted the curb in front of his house yellow so no one else would park there. So, it shouldn't be a legal yellow zone, and I can legally park there, right? My landlord says I can park there, however, according to my latest ticket, the Traffic Nazis say no. I think it's a travesty that a man can't park in front of his own house in America.

It's too bad parking tickets aren't as hard to come by as football tickets. It must have something to do with that whole supply-and-demand thing I was supposed to learn about in macroeconomics.

Adding insult to injury, those residence-hall students the Traffic Nazis are protecting us from can be found illegally parked on Claflin Road, which runs perpendicular to LeGore Lane. However, since it's only illegal to park there from 2 a.m. to 9 a.m., their cars have gone unscathed. I don't blame the Traffic Nazis for not ticketing them, though, I certainly wouldn't want to be driving around issuing tickets at 4 a.m., either.

But really, people, aren't there more productive things you could be doing than ticketing my car? Where are you when people are getting run over in crosswalks? Where are you when insane drivers fly down Manhattan Avenue at 70 mph? You really need to lighten up.

Maybe the police officers feel unappreciated. They probably think I don't like them and want to raid my house in the middle of the night but that's not the case. Let's face it, they're doing a great job and receive hardly any recognition at all. After all, they do catch me illegally parked every day. That shows they are diligent toward their task. Bravo.

I know what you're saying. Why do I park illegally every day? Because first of all, our driveway is too small for my and my roommates' cars, and second, I'm bound and determined to catch the Traffic Nazis napping. I wonder if they hide in the bushes in the front yard and wait for me to leave the house.

Tell you what, every time I see police officers, I'm going to run up and give them a great big hug and tell them how great of a job I think they're doing. Perhaps I'll even present them with small tokens of my gratitude. Maybe I'll bake them cookies. Then when I get thrown in jail for having botched an attempted arrest, perhaps they'll show mercy and not ticket my car; I'll be in the slammer and unable to move it. It's the blue 1985 Mercury Marquis parked in the yellow zone on LeGore Lane.

VIEWPOINT

JACOB PALENSKE

Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's report on President Clinton's affair with Monica Lewinsky was released last week, finally putting to rest the speculation about what happened between the president and his intern. I read parts of this report on the Internet, and it really disgusted me.

The proof is right there, in black and white. Our president is a liar, and he cheated on his wife.

But the American public doesn't care.

In a Gallup Poll taken Sept. 11 and 12, Clinton still enjoyed a 63-percent approval rating. According to a CNN story accompanying the poll, which can be read at www.cnn.com, 59 percent of people said they felt Congress should censure Clinton, while only 30 percent favor impeachment.

This sickens me.

What the public is essentially saying is that cheating on your wife and blatant and illegal lying are now socially acceptable activities.

Everyone does it, so why shouldn't the president?

I used to believe the president was the one person who stood for everything the average American, such as myself, believes in. He was the one man who defended freedom of expression, religion and speech to the rest of the world.

Since Clinton has taken office, he has bastardized the meaning of the Constitution, and he has lowered the presidency to nothing more than a position used to dodge prosecution.

The man who represents the United States to the rest of the world can't even abide by the social and legal standards his country was founded on.

But the American public still doesn't care.

They say that as a president, he has done a fairly good job, and this scandal has not affected his job performance.

I disagree.

The main function of the presidency is to represent the American government to the rest of the world.

If you were a foreign diplomat engaged in serious negotiations with Clinton, would you believe a word he said to you? He knowingly lied to the citizens of his country, his colleagues and even his own family. What would stop him from lying to you, too?

Asking one question can discredit everything Clinton says and does for the rest of his term: "How do we know you are telling the truth?"

If a person is known to be a liar, most people will take everything that person says with a grain of salt.

The leader of the free world has lowered himself to the same level as the guy in high school who made up all kinds of stories about the car he had or the girls he dated. Nobody believed the guy in high school, and nobody will believe the president, either.

But it seems as though Americans don't need to trust the president. Ignorance is bliss. If he says something, it must be true.

I hope, for the sake of the American public, members of Congress hold Clinton to a higher moral and legal standard than the American population does.

It is up to them to remove him from office and let American's know that, regardless of who you are, lying and adultery are unacceptable.

Well-watered sidewalks odd priority at K-State

Editor,

This morning, as I was riding my bike to class, I noticed something that made me proud to attend K-State. Our fine institution has enough pride in our grounds to have well-watered sidewalks. It isn't every university that takes such care as we do.

I have noticed in many places on campus that as the grounds are watered to keep the grass growing nicely in this dry time, many a sidewalk is getting its daily dose of water. I am so impressed with how healthy and vital the sidewalks are looking in these areas. In fact, I doubt there are many places outside of Manhattan that have as healthy of sidewalks as we do.

I also have noticed this is not limited to K-State. Many local businesses, such as those at Denison Avenue and Claflin Road, were taking great care as to water their sidewalks, too. In some parts of Manhattan, even the streets are being watered with consistency.

Now the only thing I am disappointed with is there are some places on campus where this care is not taken. There are sidewalks across campus that show signs of neglect (There is one section by Anderson Hall that looks particularly distressed). They are not nearly as alive as the sidewalks being watered regularly. I feel if we are going to water our sidewalks, we should take pride enough to do this everywhere on campus. All sidewalks should be treated equally when it comes to the amount of water they receive.

So to the people of the Division of Facilities, keep up the good work, but please take a little extra effort to make sure all our sidewalks are well-watered throughout this time. It is so encouraging to see people who do have faith that our sidewalks will continue to grow.

City leaders should check own pockets

Editor,

If the city officials, City Attorney Bill Frost, Attorney General Carla Stovall, the Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation board members and coordinator of religious activities Rev. Don Fallon are displeased with the banner, "Jesus Christ is Lord," in the Manhattan Gymnastics Center, they should check their pockets. They are carrying several displays that say "In God We Trust." This is in the form of the U.S. dollars and coinage. If you adopt our country and greenbacks, don't mock our God. The Manhattan Gymnastics Center also should enlarge a U.S. coin or dollar and display, "In God We Trust." Check the city funds (dollars): they also say "In God We Trust."

K-State student killed in July car crash

Editor,

A K-State student, Michael Joseph Brown, died tragically on July 25, 1998, from injuries sustained in a car accident in Independence, Mo. Michael was a sophomore at K-State. I am writing to share the heart-felt thoughts of his parents, Edward and Rosemary Brown, in the hopes that one student's life will be touched:

"I plead with all of you not to drink. Alcohol kills. If not like Mike, through death, it kills relationships. If you choose to drink, please don't drive. I would hate for you and your families to ever have to go through this. God bless you."

Saturday's game finally gives fans reason to wake up

Finally, a game.

Finally, a game worth fighting off the lack of sleep or even a hangover to crawl out of bed and see.

Finally, K-State plays Texas and Ricky Williams.

K-State's first real test of the season begins at 2:30 p.m. Saturday on Wagner Field. After two weeks of cramming, the Wildcats are ready.

K-State slaughtered Indiana State and Northern Illinois in its first two non-contests of the season. Sure, those were games that didn't help K-State much in the way of rankings. This week, UCLA jumped the Cats to the No. 4 spot on The Associated Press Poll because enough writers felt K-State's easy non-conference schedule was no kind of measuring stick for a top-5 team.

To this point in the season, the AP voters might be right. The fact that K-State leads the nation in scoring, averaging 69.5 points per game, is an offensive outpour of which many basketball teams would be proud. When Texas comes to town, all of those lofty statistics that the Wildcats have posted will come down to a real level.

For those of you who have been locked in a closet for the past two weeks, make a mental note of this: Ricky Williams is third in the nation in rushing, averaging 187.5 yards a game, and is probably one of the top-two Heisman trophy candidates thus far into the season.

Those who are familiar with Texas football might remember a man by the name of Earl Campbell. Campbell was Texas' Heisman trophy-winning running back in 1977 and was inducted into the NFL Hall of Fame after a star-studded career with the Houston Oilers.

I bring Campbell up only because so many people compare him to Williams. Williams has had six 200-yard rushing performances in his collegiate career; Campbell only had three. In fact, Williams now owns all of Campbell's records, and the comparisons are beginning to die. Williams is notably better than any running back in Texas football history.

ABC, which is televising tomorrow's game, will dub this match-up as a race for the Heisman. Brad Nessler and Gary Danielson will critique every play and every statistic Williams and Michael Bishop put up.

Don't let all of their talk fool you. Saturday's match-up is not really a Heisman match-up at all. Since Bishop has contributed little in the way of national-attention-getting numbers in K-State's first two games, he is already way out of the race. The real match-up will be between Williams and K-State's three Butkus award candidates.

Jeff Kelly, Travis Ochs and Mark Simoneau will have their chance to shine tomorrow, trying to shut down the Longhorns' deadly running attack.

With Texas' No. 1 quarterback out with a fractured throwing hand that he suffered last week against UCLA, the Longhorns will have to rest all of their offense on the shoulders of Williams. Not that Texas didn't already rely heavily on Williams to put points on the board, but with a redshirt freshman stepping in as Richard Walton's replacement, it's not likely there will be much difficulty putting down a Longhorn passing attack.

Kelly said he realized the Longhorns' running game was going to be important.

"We've got to stop Williams first and foremost, that's no doubt," Kelly said. "Stopping him is our key. We can't afford to let any part of our defense slip, but we'll start by stopping Ricky Williams."

Ochs said the fact that it is known that the Longhorns will try to run the ball doesn't make things much easier.

"He's (Williams) not only big and strong, but he's so fast," Ochs said. "He's not afraid to run up the middle and and run right at you, but he can also bust it outside. If he gets a block, he's gone. He's not like some of those guys we can just run down when they get out in the open."

There's no doubt that Williams is a legitimate threat to any defense, but if K-State can shut him down, the Wildcats might begin to get the respect they deserve.

People will begin to throw K-State's worthless non-conference schedule out the window.

A convincing K-State win will be a feat that not even the voters of the AP Poll will be able to overlook. It might even jump the Wildcats back ahead of UCLA.

Wildcats coming off of 2nd, 3rd place finishes on Sept. 5 in the Wichita State Classic

BY FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After competing at Wichita State on Sept. 5, the K-State men and women's cross country teams will speed into Lincoln, Neb., for the Woody Greeno Invitational on Saturday.

The Wildcats ran to a second-place finish in the men's meet and took third in the women's division out of six teams at the Wichita State Classic.

"It was an average team performance, but we did have several outstanding individual performances," assistant coach Mike Smith said.

Freshman Brandon Jessop placed second for the men, while sophomores Annie Wetterhus and Amanda Krauss grabbed second and third place, respectively.

Unlike the Wichita State Classic, the Woody Greeno Invitational will have 26 teams competing, featuring several Big 12 schools.

"Nebraska will be a challenging meet, a good test for us," Smith said. "Texas — an upper echelon Big 12 team — will be there, and Nebraska has a strong program."

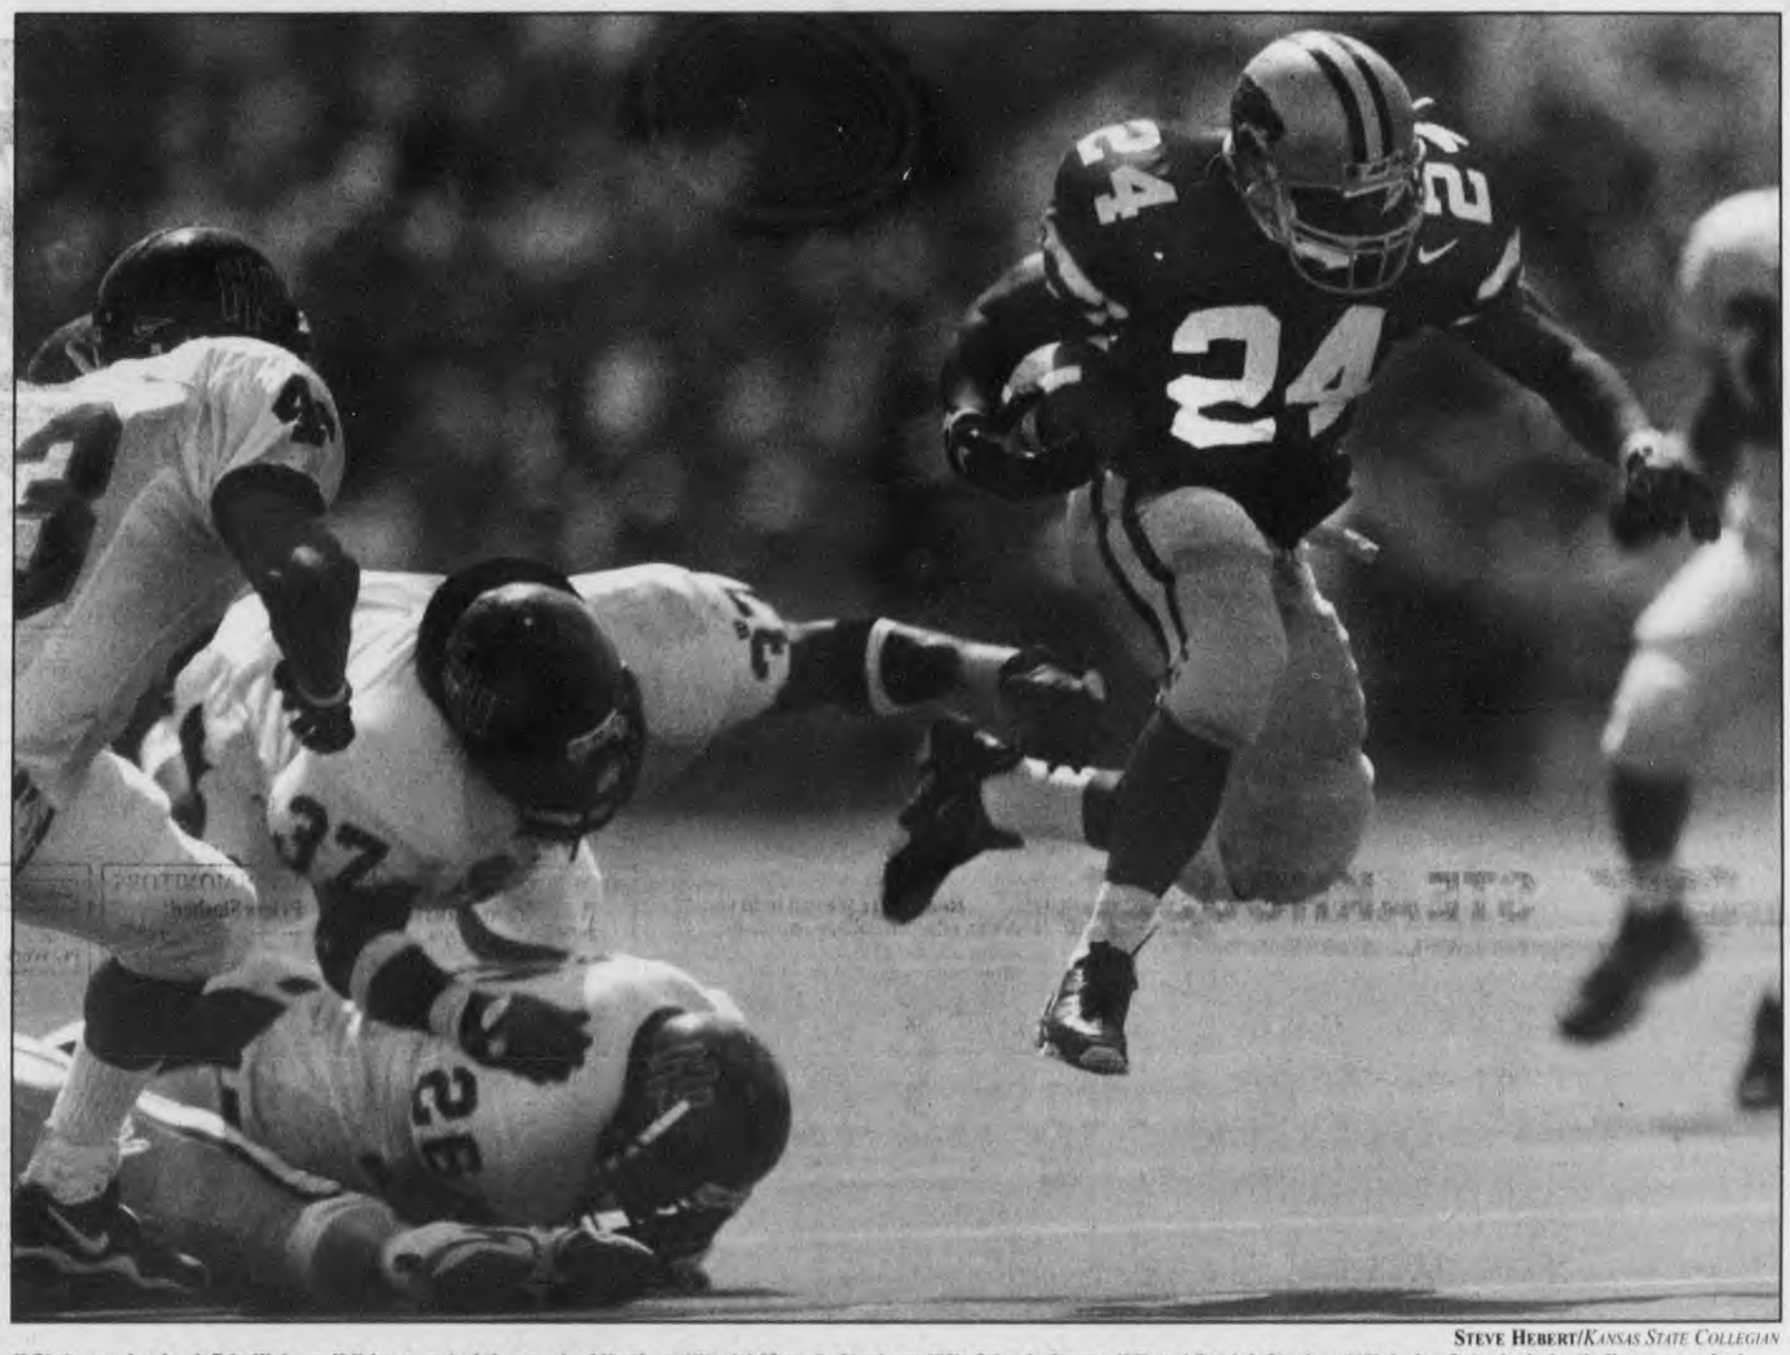
Wetterhus also said the meet will be competitive.

"Nebraska will be a lot more competitive than the first meet was. I hear the course will be more challenging, too," she said. "This one will have more hills. Wichita State's course was flat. It's just a more challenging course to run on."

Wetterhus said having more Big 12 teams in the competition should motivate others for success.

"Any time we race Big 12 teamswe have got to beat those people. That should be motivation right there. If we compete and run smart, we should do well," she said.

The invitational will mark the first time that all K-State men runners will be together for a meet.



"Everyone's healthy, and it's been a good week of practice," Smith said.

Overall, Wetterhus said the year has gone well so far.

"We haven't run with the full team yet, but we are working hard in practice," she said.

"We have a long season ahead of us. The more important meets come later."

Following the Woody Greeno Invitational, K-State will take on UMKC on Sept. 25.

K-State running back Eric Hickson (24) leaps out of the reach of Northern Illinois' Marquis Stephens (26), Orlando Bowen (37) and Patrick Stephen (43) during Saturday's football game against Northern Illinois at KSU Stadium. K-State won the game 73-7.

A NEW SEASON

Cats should be tested by Longhorns after 2 non-conference blowouts

BY SAM FELSENFELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's football season began two weeks ago. Finally, it appears the Wildcats might have a game this Saturday when Texas comes to Manhattan.

The Longhorns (1-1), who hung 31 points on fifth-ranked UCLA last week, figure to give K-State (2-0) more of a test than the Cats' first two opponents, Indiana State and Northern Illinois, in the Big 12 Conference opener for both teams.

BISHOP

The Cats said they're ready for the challenge, though.

"We feel like this is the start of our season. The first two games, we should've won, which we did," quarterback Michael Bishop said. "Now, our conference is starting. It's a different atmosphere. Basically, it's a new beginning of a new season."

On paper, it doesn't look like the Cats will have any problems on offense. They'll probably have to change the game plan a little bit, though.

Throughout the first two games, K-State has moved the ball at will, averaging 434 yards a game, despite running back David Allen, averaging 31.5 yards per punt return, is setting the Cats up with field positions that make racking up yards difficult.

For the most part, the Cats have moved the ball on the ground; 57 percent of the yardage and 74 percent of the plays called have been on the ground.

However, K-State could take to the air quickly. After two games, Texas opponents have completed 59 percent of their passes for 623 yards, seven touchdowns and only two interceptions.

HICKSON

"They have a couple of weaknesses in their secondary, and hopefully we can go out and attack them early and get up big," Bishop said.

K-State, averaging 69.5 points a game, should continue to light up the scoreboard against the Horns, who are allowing 42.5 points a game.

Still, the Cats said they have respect for the Horns' ability to make stops.

"Their defense looks really good," K-State running back Eric Hickson said. "They're big up front. They run well, and they're well coached. They don't make too many mistakes."

"However," Hickson said, "I don't think they're too much for us. If we control the line of scrimmage, good things are going to happen."

Defensively, the Cats will have their hands full trying to contain an "exclamation point" and a "question mark."

Running back Ricky Williams, the exclamation point, is not only an early Heisman trophy favorite but the leading returning vote-getter from the 1997 Heisman race. Williams, who won the Doak Walker Award — given to the top collegiate running back in the nation — with 1,893 yards rushing, is up to his old ways again in 1998.

APPLEWHITE

Throughout two games, the senior is third in the nation with a 187.5-yard per-game average and already has scored nine touchdowns.

"Ricky himself has got the whole package," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "He can do all of the things you'd like a running back to do, and he's a guy that can bounce the ball outside — he can go laterally as fast as he can go forward, and that's pretty fast. He can run downhill — he'll put his pads down and run over the top of you if you're not careful."

However, the question mark lies at the quarterback. Senior Richard Walton, the Horns' 6-foot 5-inch, 225-pound starter, will miss four to six weeks after fracturing a bone in his throwing hand. Taking his spot and trying to keep the Cats' Lynch Mob defense from cheating against the run, will be 6-foot 1-inch, 195-pound redshirt freshman Major Applewhite.

Applewhite has attempted seven passes in college, completing five for 59 yards. He hasn't faced a defense the caliber of the Lynch Mob, though, which leads the nation in pass-efficiency defense at 33.5 percent.

So, will Williams be expected to handle an extra load for Texas on Saturday?

Probably, K-State defensive end Joe Bob Clements said. "We're thinking he's going to get a couple more carries than he has in the past. But we've seen some film on the second-string quarterback (Applewhite), and he's shown the capabilities to throw the ball and he also can produce. He just hasn't had many snaps yet."

WILLIAMS

Protecting Williams and Applewhite will be a mammoth offensive line. The five starters average 6 feet 5 inches, 310 pounds. Backup left guard Travis Wood, at 6 feet 3 inches, 295 pounds, is the shortest and lightest on the two-deep.

"Their offensive line is probably as big as there is in the country," Snyder said.

"Tackle to tackle, nine out of 10 guys on their two deep are 300-plus, and the other one's 295. If he has a good breakfast tomorrow, he'll be 300, too. They're a pretty good-sized bunch of people."

SGA opens phone hotline

BY MIKE WATSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Governing Association is ready to listen to comments, questions and complaints about issues affecting students.

SGA recently established a hotline students can use to gain direct access to student senators. The number to call is 532-7777.

Senate Chair Gabe Eckert said the hotline will help students give senators feedback about campus issues.

"I think the SGA hotline is a great opportunity for the student government to become more accessible to increase communications and become more accountable," Eckert said.

Eckert said the service looks to gain popularity as publicity builds.

"The more students that know about it, the more effective the service is going to be," he said.

By using existing telephone lines, SGA spent little money for the service.

"The only funding will be to cover the publicity," Eckert said. "We are taking a phone that we had for internal use and trying to make it more accessible to students."

SGA members will answer the phone on a voluntary basis. The program is another way for the student government to serve the student body, Eckert said. Those who answer calls will have information at hand to answer questions.

While the Senate intends to keep a log of callers, if the caller wishes to remain anonymous, the hotline attendant will make exceptions, Eckert said.

"When they call, we read a message asking for name, class, and comment. If they ask to remain anonymous, we'll do it," Senate Communications Chair Mary Bosco said.

Callers are asked for their name and class to gather statistics about gender and class distinction. It also will allow senate members to give the callers more information and referrals, she said.

Students raise money to fight disease

BY AMANDA EWING
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Multiple sclerosis has no cure.

This disease of the central nervous system strikes people of all races, ethnicities and religions. It doesn't discriminate between man or woman, adult or child.

Each year, the National Multiple Sclerosis Society raises thousands of dollars to fund research and treatment. Two K-State students are helping the society raise the needed money to find a cure.

The MS 150 Race is one of many national fund-raising efforts by the 90 national MS chapters. The eastern Kansas race is Saturday and Sunday. Cyclists travel 80 miles the first day and 70 the second on their route, which stretches from Topeka to Garnett, Kan.

The event isn't a race, as cyclists are able to go their own pace, leave when they choose and stop at the numerous rest stations along the course.

Bennington said riders don't have to be in excellent shape, they just have to have their heart in it.

"I'll probably do this forever," Bennington said.

Sheri Daudet, branch manager of the eastern Kansas branch of the middle-America chapter of the National MS Society, said last year's race raised more than $150,000. This is the 13th year of the race.

All money raised from the race goes to the National MS Society. A minimum of $150 is required of each cyclist, and each team pays a $25 registration fee. Bennington received her $150 from Putnam Hall's Hall Governing Board.

John Klingele, freshman in civil engineering and president of Putnam's HGB, said Bennington came to the HGB and asked for a donation.

"She was blown away by the amount," Klingele said. "If we've got the money, we might as well use it for something good."

The team Bennington and Sheeran were on last year donated nearly $6,000 to the MS 150 Race, Sheeran said. Their team this year, Sore-n-High, should donate about the same amount.

According to the National MS Society World Wide Web site, nearly one-third of a million Americans have MS, and 200 new people are diagnosed with MS each week. Daudet said they have 750 clients with MS, and that they estimate nearly 1,000 individuals in eastern Kansas have MS.

The disease results when myelin, the protective insulation that surrounds nerve fibers, eventually breaks down. The destroyed myelin is replaced by scars called sclerotics, which occur in multiple places.

Symptoms of the disease range from abnormal fatigue to complete paralysis. It is an unpredictable disease.

Students learn from comic book

Graphic novel 'Maus' being used by instructors for its unique view of the Holocaust

BY SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bring out your comic books. It's time to study.

Literary purists, relax. Issues of "Spawn" or "Superman" haven't become the collegiate standard text. It takes an original kind of comic to make this cut for the classroom.

This semester, students in 20th Century American Literature and American Ethnic Literature classes will have a two-volume comic book or graphic novel called "Maus: A Survivor's Tale," by cartoonist Art Spiegelman as part of their required reading.

The strongly autobiographical book tells the story of Artie, a comic artist attempting to understand his father's experience in the Holocaust. The frame-by-frame account follows both his father's experiences in the Auschwitz concentration camp and Artie's struggles to understand.

By the way, his father is a mouse.

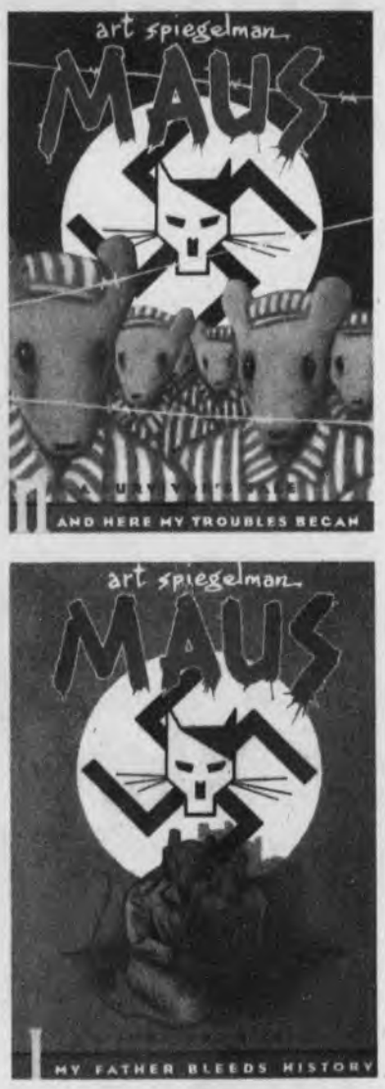
In fact, all of the characters in "Maus" are animals with human qualities — the Jews are mice, the Nazis are cats, the Poles are pigs, the French are frogs and an African-American man is shown as a dog.

Alicia Huebner, junior in public relations, said she was surprised when she first saw the book for her American Ethnic Literature class last spring. After reading it, though, Huebner said the contrast between the style, usually regarded as lighthearted, and the grim subject brought more attention to Spiegelman's serious plot.

"This was the only piece of literature I've ever read that was written this way. I think it was written this way to draw attention and because it was the only way he could get his feelings out," Huebner said.

The combination of art and text allowed for unique messages, Huebner said. One particular image that stood out was of the mice running away shown from an aerial perspective, where their path is revealed to be in the shape of a swastika.

"Visually, that came across better than you could have ever described in words," Huebner said.



Another section Huebner said she still remembers is when the main character must deal with his mother's suicide.

"I had to read it several times, not just to get what he was saying but also the emotion of it," Huebner said.

Lillian Kremer, associate professor of English and instructor of the courses, said many readers initially are shocked by Spiegelman's use of human characters as animals.

"Once you get past seeing shapes of people as animal shapes, you know that he is not being trivial. The form is normally not associated with serious literature, but the approach of the writer is very serious," Kremer said.

In 20th Century American Literature, this comic book is used with other works such as "The Great Gatsby," "The Sound And The Fury" and "Death of a Salesman" to explore the evolution of the American novel and drama, as well as experimentation in storytelling.

Hale remodeling complete; students' research easier

BY JENNI LATZKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students might find it difficult to find a periodical discussing the differences and similarities between the Aborigines of New Zealand and American Indians in the newly remodeled Hale Library.

For many students, class assignments requiring research in the library often sound difficult. However, since the completion of the remodeling of Hale last October, the library has become easier for students to use.

"The main problem that we see is that a lot of students are afraid to ask questions," Laurel Littrell, humanities reference librarian, said. "We're here to help them, and they should feel free to come up to us and ask about anything."

Students also shouldn't worry about trying to find materials that seem to keep disappearing on them. The library is done with shifting materials around to accommodate construction; therefore, students should be able to find what they need easily.

Hale offers many resources for students besides books. The library has computer workstations for research, archives of historical articles related to the university, test files and a copy center. All can be used by any K-State student with a valid university ID. K-State faculty, staff and even students from other Kansas universities are also welcome to use these facilities.

Jan Crow, director of marketing and public relations for K-State libraries, said the library has added databases and indices and has renovated its World Wide Web site.

"We're looking at new and better things for students to use to access information," Crow said.

For example, students can access the Internet for research purposes on the second-floor computers. Some professors also might have files of their old tests available for students to copy or study. "The test files are used heavily in our resources section," Littrell said.

In addition to research, students can use the library for studying or for resting. With the renovations, Hale now has nearly 2,000 seats available in the form of study tables or couches.

Last year, the library relaxed its no-food-or-drink policy to allow beverages outside of the 24-hour study area as long as they are in spill-proof containers.

She said the idea of allowing beverages in the building came from the popularity of coffee shop/bookstores in the area. She said many people enjoy reading or studying with a drink by their side and that many people have welcomed the changes.

Hale is also the home of the science library and the Multicultural Research and Resource Center, and it also serves as a depository for state and national government publications.

The library's new format might be confusing at first to many students, even seniors. Kimberly Kasper, senior in health information management, said a map of where materials are located would be the best tool for new students to use.

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING
RECENTLY, MORNINGSTAR CALLED US CHEAP.
IT'S NOT EVERY DAY YOU GET A COMPLIMENT LIKE THAT.
All financial companies charge operating fees and expenses—some more than others. Of course, the lower the expenses you pay, the better. That way, more of your money goes where it should—towards building a comfortable future.
We make low expenses a top priority.
As the largest retirement system in the world[1]—a nonprofit company focused exclusively on the financial needs of the educational and research communities—our expenses are among the lowest in the insurance and mutual fund industries.[2]
In fact, TIAA-CREF's 0.31% average fund expenses are less than half of the expense charges of comparable funds.[3] It's why Morningstar—one of the nation's leading sources of annuity and mutual fund information—says, "At that level [TIAA-CREF] is cheaper than any other [variable annuity] policy, and is even competitive with the cheapest mutual fund complexes, though it offers far more benefits."[4]
"TIAA-CREF sets the standard in the financial services industry."
Of course, expenses are only one factor to consider when you make an investment decision. Morningstar also noted our commitment to "consumer education, service" and "solid investment performance." Because that can make a difference in the long run, too.
At TIAA-CREF, we believe people would like to spend more in retirement, not on their retirement company. Today, over two million people count on that approach to help them build a comfortable and secure future. So can you. To find out more, call us at 1 800 842-2776. We'd consider it a compliment.

'Rounders' cannot deliver its promised royal flush

BY RYAN DOOM
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Movie Review

out of 5 stars

Matt Damon and Edward Norton attempt a royal flush in their new film, "Rounders," but come up a few cards short.

Damon stars as Mike McDermott, a struggling law student paying his way through college by gambling. After he loses his entire tuition fund in just one hand of poker, he promises to quit the game forever.

Everything is going fine until his old partner and best friend, Worm (Norton), is released from prison and lures Mike back into the world of cards. Trouble begins when a small-time Russian mobster named Teddy KGB (John Malkovich) wants back the $25,000 he loaned Worm. Mike and Worm only have five days to get the money, or Worm will no longer exist.

The insights into the mind of a poker player are the best part of the movie. Mike narrates the film and explains the secrets of poker. By watching the other players' movements and habits, Mike can tell if the other guy is bluffing or if he has a full house.

Director John Dahl wanted the card scenes to be absolutely realistic, and they were. They might be too realistic for non-card players, who might feel completely clueless. When the characters start talking poker jargon, they offer no explanation and make the audience feel left out.

Damon, in his first starring role since "Good Will Hunting," portrays yet another loner who just happens to have a special gift. This time it's poker instead of mathematics. Mike is dedicated to Worm and promises to help him get out of his debt.

Norton, on the other hand, has made each of his performances ("Primal Fear" and "The People vs. Larry Flynt") unique and different. This time as Worm, he plays a dirty-poker player always looking for the edge to win.

"Rounders" explores the idea of how much a person can and will take from a self-destructive friend. Though the premise of the film is intriguing, the movie is only holding three aces. Sometimes, those last two cards are just hard to find.

Miami-based string quartet brings classical sounds to K-State campus

BY ERIN MCGLINN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Bergonzi String Quartet will give its audience a cultural experience when it performs at McCain Auditorium at 3 p.m. Sunday.

Bergonzi, a Miami-based group, is celebrated for its Latin influence and classical sounds. Consisting of a cellist, violist and two violinists, the four complement one other by blending distinct sounds to give each piece an original sound.

The cellist of the quartet, Ross Harbaugh, said he would describe the concert experience as a time machine, because the classic sounds of past composers are being performed, almost re-enacted, for the audience of today.

Compositions ranging from classical to contemporary will be played when the quartet takes the stage.

Bergonzi will play three pieces by composers Alberto Ginastera, an Argentinean composer credited for Bergonzi's Latin influence, Franz Joseph Haydn and Johannes Brahms.

Cora Cooper, associate professor of music, will present a lecture on the background of each of the pieces being performed prior to the concert at 2 p.m.

Tickets for the concert can be purchased at the McCain box office or by phone at 532-6428. Ticket prices are $16 for the general public, $14 for those 65 and older and $8 for students and anyone 18 or younger.

ple who are unaware of the copyright laws.

"We're going to take an educational attitude," Larson said. "We're going to explain to them that they must be licensed to sell K-State apparel."

The penalties will not be severe for vendors who are willing to cooperate with CLC, Larson said.

"We would take the merchandise," Larson said. "The vendor then signs a letter of uncontested surrender."

If the seller isn't willing to cooperate, Larson said the company would not be afraid to take further action.

"Copyright infringement is a serious crime," Larson said. "If they don't cooperate, we'll call in local law enforcement."

Larson said it is important for the merchandise to be licensed because a portion of the revenues goes to the university, which spends the money on scholarships.

"Anyone using the marks illegally is taking money away from the students," Larson said.

Larson said besides hurting the university, illegal merchandise is often not up to the quality standards of licensed items.

"We're out to protect the consumer — number one — and protect the university as well," Larson said.

In protecting the consumers, Larson said she will be on the lookout for those distributing the merchandise, not those buying it.

"We won't be taking the shirt off of anyone's back," Larson said. "We go after the sellers."

Representatives from CLC will be looking for illegal merchandise before, during and after Saturday's game against Texas.

believes the policies K-State has in place are sufficient.

"All of our policies addressed the issues involved in that situation, and so there was no need to change anything," she said.

Robel said the university has had anti-hazing policies in place since 1957.

"Anything construed as hazing is illegal and not supported," Robel said.

Greek Affairs also has substance-abuse policies and a risk-management team in place.

The policies require that all social events be registered 48 hours in advance.

Robel said the policies include checking all party participants' IDs, providing designated drivers and offering alternate food and beverages. They also require that all alcohol be dispensed from a central location, either through a "Bring Your Own Beer" policy or a licensed caterer.

Robel said violations of the policy are dealt with on a case-by-case basis. Consequences can vary from intramural suspension to removing a chapter's charter.

Robel said she couldn't comment specifically on the incident at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology until she had more information.

why a career at Regional Mortgage?

The corporate culture.

[We stuff pockets, not shirts.]

We've seen it happen. Your first career move is a bucket of cold water. A few hundred boring lectures, lots of pressure and competition, big authority figure looming, massive politics. Didn't you already do that in college?

Regional Mortgage is real life, real people, real opportunity. We'll pay to teach you the mortgage business. And there's not a podium in sight.

We're an unusual company. We actually like people more than numbers. So expect a lot of support from us, including aggressive marketing programs to give you a strong base of leads to work from.

Find us, find your future. By phone, by fax, by net. Find us, and ask for Tedd Stephenson, President.

Sykes to anchor technology park

BY TL MEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan's Corporate Technology Park is making progress, with its first corporate resident expected to open in October.

Sykes Enterprises, the park's anchor tenant, will be housed in a 42,000 square foot building when it opens its doors next month. The park, which occupies a little less than 190 acres along Kansas Highway 18, is adjacent to Manhattan Regional Airport.

City Manager Gary Greer said the park will be an important addition to Manhattan's business scene.

"It will allow for the creating of hundreds of jobs, increase the tax base and diversify the economy," Greer said.

He said the location is also an important factor in making the park successful. The location was considered ideal because of its proximity to the airport and easy access to Interstate 70. However, improvements to the area still are necessary to allow the park to serve its businesses, Greer said.

Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce spokeswoman Ann Harts said that even though part of K-18 is already four lanes, it is in poor condition and has visibility problems.

Greer said the city is looking into widening K-18 to four lanes all the way to the interstate and improving the overall condition of the road.

Greer said funds for the proposed improvements would come from a variety of sources.

"It will be a combining of many sources of funding including federal, state and local funds," he said.

The park's grounds cost the city $974,000. They were paid for by city funds that were saved over a period of time.

The park has all services, including electric, gas, sewer, water and fiber optics, Harts said.

"It is a fully designated fiber-optic park," Greer said.

The park has space to house nearly 35 companies. The park can be host to a variety of industries, with portions of the park zoned for light manufacturing and other portions zoned for highly technologically advanced corporations, Greer said.

The chamber will be in charge of marketing the park and is putting together the marketing plan, Harts said. The marketing plan will consist of a comprehensive plan and a park master plan.

Greer said community assets, such as a strong work ethic and an educated population, will be strong selling points when recruiting corporations to come to Manhattan.

He said several businesses are interested in the park, but the main concern is getting Sykes Enterprises set up and running.

"This is the most significant economic development tool in the city of Manhattan," Greer said.

Neil Simon play opens

BY JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan's Community Theatre is beginning a new season with a Neil Simon comedy.

"Last of the Red Hot Lovers" will be presented at the Manhattan Center for the Arts for the next two weekends. The three-act play centers around a quiet, middle-aged man who one day decides to shake things up in his life by having an affair.

"It's a very compassionate play about the human condition," director Maggie Jackson said. "However, being a Neil Simon play, it's full of laughs."

The local production involves four characters: Charles Faulk, playing the lover, and three women he encounters. Because it's a community theater production, the actors must go from day jobs to rehearsals three days a week, sometimes late into the night. The week of dress rehearsals has involved fine tuning, Jackson said.

Time conflicts are a problem; one actress is out of town a few days this week for a business meeting. However, Jackson said all the kinks would be worked out by tonight.

"We're working out minor things with the technicians and making little adjustments before opening night," Jackson said.

The play will run tonight through Sunday and Sept. 24-27, with all shows Thursday through Saturday at 8 p.m., and Sunday matinees at 2 p.m. Students can purchase walk-in tickets for Thursday night and Sunday afternoon shows for $5 or reserve tickets for other nights for $7.

Public to see grand-jury testimony this morning

By JOHN SOLOMON
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A key Democratic senator suggested Sunday that President Clinton immediately volunteer to testify before Congress to halt a "political water torture" that escalates this morning when Americans view raw footage of the president's grand-jury testimony about Monica Lewinsky.

That video will show Clinton admitting "inappropriate intimate contact" and "sexual banter" with Lewinsky but resisting prosecutors' efforts to define the conduct further. Clinton offers many legalistic replies and, at times, shows remorse.

"I regret that what began as friendship came to include this conduct," the president answered when he was first asked a sex-related question by prosecutors just seven minutes into his Aug. 17 testimony. The president's testimony was described to The Associated Press by lawyers familiar with it.

CLINTON

The moments of presidential regret are interspersed with legal hairsplitting, involving the terms "sexual relations" and "alone" and, in one exchange, the tense of a verb.

At one point, Clinton was asked why he failed to produce to Paula Jones' lawyers a series of correspondence between himself and Kathleen Willey, the former White House volunteer who accused the president of an unwanted sexual advance near the Oval Office in 1993.

Clinton will admit to 'sexual banter' with Lewinsky, show remorse

Clinton said he understood the subpoena to cover personal documents, and the Willey letters were in White House files. If the lawyer wanted the letters, Clinton said, they should have issued two subpoenas — one personal and the other official.

The White House and Congress — both facing perils in the unfolding impeachment proceedings — braced for the release today of an avalanche of new evidence that includes more material in which Lewinsky explicitly describes sex acts with Clinton, the president's videotape, presidential phone messages left at Lewinsky's home and the FBI test results that conclude the semen on one of Lewinsky's dresses belongs to Clinton.

Clinton made a brief appearance Sunday morning at a fund-raiser aboard a Potomac River cruise ship, and then he and Hillary Rodham Clinton attended services at Foundry United Methodist Church, the first time since before his Aug. 17 grand-jury testimony. Today, when the 2,800 pages of documents and videotape are released, Clinton will be in New York City addressing the United Nations.

A key senator suggested on the Sunday talk shows that Clinton immediately volunteer to testify to the House Judiciary Committee and answer all questions fully to spare the country further embarrassment.

"I believe the president would be well served to explain exactly what he did, exactly what he was thinking, do it to the Judiciary Committee, and let's vote, and let's move on one way or the other," said Sen. John Kerry, a Massachusetts Democrat and Clinton ally.

"The nation is being ill-served by this political water torture that is taking place in a highly calculated, highly partisan way," Kerry told NBC regarding Congress' selected release of evidence.

Kerry's call for voluntary Clinton testimony was embraced by several colleagues, including Republican Sen. John Ashcroft, a presidential aspirant and harsh Clinton critic, and House Judiciary Committee members Barney Frank, D-Mass., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C.

Uneasy about defending some of Clinton's legalistic answers, Democrats are discussing whether to concede Clinton committed perjury and accept Lewinsky's version of their sexual encounters, even though Clinton disputes her allegations that he touched her and sexually stimulated her.

Car wreck takes life of student

By LAUREN POSLADEK
Kansas State Collegian

A K-State sophomore died Friday after a one-car accident on College Avenue.

Justin J. Robben, 19, sophomore in mechanical engineering, of Oakley, Kan., was airlifted to Wichita's St. Francis Hospital after he was thrown from his 1993 Dodge Intrepid in the early-morning accident. He died later that morning.

According to Riley County Police Department reports, Robben was northbound on College Avenue at 12:50 a.m. Friday when the car's right tires left the road and struck a cement culvert near the intersection with Hillview Drive. His vehicle was airborne for nearly 51 feet and rolled several times before coming to rest on its right side.

Reports indicate that Robben was thrown from the car while it was rolling. Ochs was not ejected. Neither occupant was wearing a seat belt.

Fran Robben, Justin's mother, said Justin's dream was to graduate from K-State.

Career Fair this afternoon at Bramlage

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

Dressed in business clothes and with résumés in hand, K-State students will have the opportunity to make real-world connections Tuesday.

Career and Employment Services will sponsor the fifth-annual Career Fair from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. in Bramlage Coliseum. Shuttle buses will run between the K-State Student Union parking lot and Bramlage every 15 minutes. This year's fair was relocated to Bramlage because of the Union renovation project.

Corey Hopkins, junior in accounting, said he is going to the fair in hopes of finding a summer internship or a part-time job. Hopkins said the fair is a way to get valuable experience.

Hopkins said he believes connections help people obtain jobs.

"If it comes down to a college degree and a 3.5 GPA and a 3.2 GPA with job experience, the guy with the 3.2 will get the job," Hopkins said.

Marcia Shuley, associate director of CES and chairwoman of the Career Fair committee, said the all-university fair evolved from different college fairs.

"We had companies that wanted to come to both fairs but just didn't have the staff," Shuley said.

As a result, some companies asked if

"FOR A LOT OF THESE STUDENTS, SOMEONE HAS BELIEVED ENOUGH IN THEM TO INVEST IN THEM."

STEVEN DEARINGER/Kansas State Collegian

President Jon Wefald addresses the crowd Friday evening at the kickoff celebration for the KSU Foundation's $50-million scholarship campaign. Speakers and various musical groups entertained the invitation-only crowd outside the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

the Quest for $50 million

Gala marks beginning of KSU Foundation scholarship drive

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

The KSU Foundation kicked off its $50 million academic-scholarship campaign with a gala on Friday night outside the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art

Even before the kickoff, the Foundation was already halfway toward its goal.

Fireworks spelled out the Foundation's $50 million goal for the more than 300 invited guests in attendance. After a sharp report, another display showed nearly $26.5 million, money that already had been raised for the campaign.

The "Rally Under the Stars" featured valet parking, several musical performances and speeches by key leaders in the scholarship drive.

Richard Pearson, Foundation trustee and scholarship-campaign chairman, arrived in a 1959 Ford Fairlane convertible to begin the event. Pearson graduated from K-State in 1959 and went on to become the president and chief operating officer of Trans World Airlines.

"If you want students to succeed, the best bet is to help them get a college education," Pearson said, challenging the audience to offer its support to the campaign.

Pearson also introduced Student Body President Tracey Mann and Liz Neufeld, senior in agricultural economics, who gave a student perspective on the campaign.

MANN

"Every one of those students I walk to class with represents students back in their hometown working to save money to come to school," Mann said.

Mann spoke to the working student, the student with a family, the student living below the poverty line — any student who could not attend K-State without a scholarship. Seventy percent of K-State students receive some form of financial aid, the highest percentage among Kansas Board of Regents institutions and schools in the Big 12 Conference.

"For a lot of these students, someone has believed enough in them to invest in them," Mann said.

Neufeld said scholarships are gifts that come with strings attached — just like the bucket calf her parents gave her as a first 4-H project. She said students realize they need to work hard to earn a scholarship and succeed.

President Jon Wefald also spoke to donors after riding to the event with Willie the Wildcat as his chauffeur. After highlighting K-State's academic and athletic successes, Wefald encouraged those at the gala to dig deep for the campaign.

■ OUR OPINION
The Collegian editorial board says this gala shows how far K-State has come.

"I know virtually everyone here tonight has given at least some time or funds for K-State," Wefald said. "It's important from time to time to set back and celebrate the good things of your institution."

Closing his remarks and referring to Saturday's football game against Texas, Wefald said, "Let's get it on. Let us get it on," amid an eruption of cheers from the crowd.

Before the program began, attendees were entertained by the K-State Jazz Quintet and the Men's Glee Club. The K-State Marching Band also performed during the event, which was catered by the K-State Student Union.

Laurie Ekart, chairwoman of the committee that organized the evening, said many things were donated in order to keep costs low. She said a specific dollar figure for what the event cost was not available.

Foundation President and CEO Gary Hellebust said the Foundation hopes the campaign will produce between $2 million and $2.5 million in expendable and endowed gifts a year. The $50 million raised will create an endowment fund; interest from the fund will be used to generate scholarships.

"People are real eager," Hellebust said. "They firmly believe they want

Diabetes will be focus for new Miss America

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. — Diabetes has a new face: that of Miss America.

Hours after being crowned Miss America 1999, Nicole Johnson, who suffers from juvenile diabetes and wears an insulin pump 24 hours a day, promised Sunday to use her newfound fame to spotlight the disease.

"It makes me the perfect spokesperson for that issue," said the aspiring TV news anchor from Roanoke, Va.

The 24-year-old native of Seminole, Fla., is a graduate of the University of South Florida and Regent University in Virginia Beach, Va. She also has worked for the Christian Broadcasting Network.

Seeking scholarship money, she competed twice in the Miss Florida Pageant before moving to Virginia to attend graduate school and competing in that state's pageant three times, finally winning this year.

She walked off with the Miss America crown — and a $40,000 scholarship — on Saturday after performing "That's Life," a song about triumph over adversity.

It's a topic about which she knows plenty.

"I've been taught since I was a little girl to never give up," she said.

She was diagnosed with juvenile diabetes, an uncommon form of the disease, at the age of 19. For four years, she had to eat meals at the same time each day, take insulin injections and carefully monitor her blood-sugar levels.

Fourteen months ago, Johnson got an insulin pump, a small instrument that looks like a telephone pager. It delivers insulin through a needle and regulates the flow, giving her as much as she needs.

The device has freed her from the restrictions and injections, she said.

She wore it during all phases of the pageant except the swimsuit competition.

One thing she won't be wearing is the crown.

Pageant officials are de-emphasizing the royal aspects of Miss America in hopes of casting her as a relevant, down-to-earth role model, and Johnson declined to put the crown on during a news conference Sunday, offering instead to hold it.

Her diabetes didn't interfere with tradition. After getting only 2 1/2 hours sleep, she frolicked in the surf for photographers, a tradition for all new Miss Americas.

It won't get in her way as Miss America, she said.

"I've always been a go-getter," she said.

Asked for her opinion on the White House sex scandal, Johnson called on President Clinton to resign for the good of the country.

"I personally think it would be better for him to resign," she said. "That's my personal opinion because I think it is so sad. He is the number one role model in the world, basically."

Water, debris bury entire town in Mexico

VALDIVIA, Mexico — The small Mexican town of Valdivia, on Mexico's Pacific Coast, is no more.

It was buried under tons of mud, rocks and fallen trees brought by torrential floods earlier this month that devastated much of southern Chiapas state.

About the only thing that could be seen standing in Valdivia over the weekend was a big statue of the Virgin of Guadalupe in the main square and the locomotive and cars of a freight convoy in the train station — both partly buried in caked mud.

Several hundred survivors in the community of 7,000 people said as many as 200 bodies might be buried under the avalanche that rolled off mountainsides down the Novillero River and into the lowlands.

Many more were injured and many were missing, perhaps swept out to sea. No official death toll has been given, and Valdivia still was largely isolated Saturday. Food and drinking water were both scarce.

A few government helicopters came in with food and medicine. They had to land outside of town to avoid getting stuck in the mud.

After days of rain, the slide began in the early morning of Sept. 8, said survivor Alejandra Dominguez, who on Saturday sat dejectedly on the platform of the train station, staring at Locomotive No. 5848.

Dominguez said her husband, the station watchman, was struck by a boulder near the station and taken to a nearby hospital.

"Many people were swept away and died here. I saved myself by climbing on top of the engine," Dominguez said, tears rolling down her cheeks.

Judith Escobar, a widow and mother of six, also survived the mudslide. "There are many dead, maybe several hundred. We saw how they were swept away by the waters. We were saved by God's will," she said.

Near downtown, rows of houses and other buildings were covered with mud — some with their roofs smashed. A few dogs and pigs rooted in the debris looking for something to eat.

Scavenger birds circled overhead, attracted by the smell of decaying bodies. A few men with tools were digging in the mud, trying to clear a few homes and looking for some loose timbers to build a lean-to.

One of these men was Guadalupe Vasquez, a farmer from the edge of town. He and his family were saved, he said, but added, "I lost everything. The farm was wiped out."

In the rest of the state, things weren't much better. The federal Department of Health warned the death toll in Chiapas would probably rise as more bodies are recovered.

President Ernesto Zedillo arrived Saturday in the town of Tapachula, near the border with Guatemala, for his fifth visit in 10 days to coordinate relief efforts.

Like Valdivia, at least 35 rural communities have been damaged badly and remain virtually inaccessible.

K-State professor produces 2 programs for PBS

BY SHANDA PARKER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three months of work by K-State faculty and staff will culminate tonight on public television.

The Educational Communications Center and the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications produced two television programs, "Farming the Wheat State" and "A Wheat State Q & A," which will air in connection with the PBS Frontline series, "The Farmer's Wife."

"The Farmer's Wife" will air nationally. It deals with issues concerning family farming.

Lori Bergen, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications, was asked to be the executive producer of the programs. Bergen said it's a big deal for K-State to have the resources, expertise and facilities to produce television programs.

"Kansas State produced two high-quality programs," Bergen said.

Bergen said the work of the ECC and the journalism school was important in the production, and that it gave professors a chance to do what they teach.

"It is important that the university can give back to the state of Kansas," Bergen said.

Bergen said the public broadcasting stations in Kansas saw a need to produce two programs that would provide local perspective on the topic of family farms. The stations in Kansas asked the ECC and the journalism school to produce the two programs.

"It is a pleasure to work with the public broadcast stations," Mel Chastain, ECC director, said.

"Farming the Wheat State" is a one-hour program that will air before the Frontline series. It features five interviews with agricultural experts from around the state, who address the role of the family farm, federal farm policy, psychological issues of farming, uncertainty of agriculture and the future of farming.

Bergen said the purpose of the program is to help viewers who watch the Frontline series to answer questions and address issues of Kansas agriculture.

CThere is a local connection to issues and questions in the program," Bergen said.

"A Wheat State Q & A" will air Tuesday at 9 p.m. This program will have at least five expert analysts who will answer viewers' calls during the program.

Chastain said the programs took three months to produce, with support from the office of Provost James Coffman.

He said producing programs with the pubic broadcasting stations is just one of the directions that the center is taking in communications.

"We are pleased to do it," Chastain said.

"Farming the Wheat State" will air at 7 tonight on KTWU-TV and the statewide PBS network. The same stations also will show "A Wheat State Q & A."

Educational improvement important priority to dean

BY TL MEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Editor's Note: This the sixth story in the Collegian's "Meet Your Dean" series.

If it came down to an athletic matchup between K-State and his alma mater, Michael C. Holen is no fool. He would pick K-State.

Holen, a Stanford graduate and dean of the College of Education, attends 10 to 15 Catbacker events every year.

"I admire athleticism in young people," Holen said.

Holen, who has been at K-State since 1971, has served as professor, acting dean and department head and has been dean of education since 1991.

Holen said continually improving education and educational systems ranks as one of his highest priorities.

"The accelerating increase in quantity and complexity of knowledge demands more from teachers and students every day," Holen said. "Without a commitment to continuous improvement, our education system and the society which depends upon it would quickly be rendered unable to progress and ultimately unable to survive."

David Royse, associate professor of music education, said Holen's leadership has improved the college.

"He is a man of extraordinary vision and insight," Royse said.

"Because of his leadership, the College of Education has been on the cutting edge of educational innovation on campus, in the state and in the nation."

Holen said one thing that makes the College of Education different from the other colleges at K-State is the hands-on experience that students receive early in the program.

"Our students are involved throughout their program in supervised practical application, but their field-based experience becomes especially intense in the last year and a half, completed with a capstone clinical experience/assessment of 12 to 16 weeks full-time teaching school children," Holen said.

HOLEN

Some of Holen's goals for this school year include increasing scholarships available to students and improving the ability to teach technology use to students.

Diversity, in large public universities and in the teaching profession, is another area of strong interest for Holen.

He said universities across the country historically have enrolled and graduated fewer minority students than population statistics predict.

Holen said he has worked as a consultant with many predominantly black universities to help develop academic programs and administrative systems.

For his work, Holen was the recipient of the Presidential Award for Distinguished Service to Minority Education in 1988.

OUR VIEW

New era at K-State highlighted at gala

The KSU Foundation was host to a gala Friday night that would have been unthinkable several years ago.

Whether by circumstance of a combination of a strong economy and football team, through the unparalleled alumni support we receive at this university, or by a combination of the above, the Foundation was able to pull out all the stops for an enormous event — the kickoff of its $50 million scholarship drive.

It was staggering. It was a party in the area north of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, with banners and lights hanging from the trees, tents of food and beverages, performances by a variety of different musical groups from K-State, an appearance by Willie the Wildcat and fireworks from the top of McCain Auditorium.

It is apparent that things steadily are improving for our university.

The Foundation was trying to get potential scholarship donors together to raise $50 million. It was already halfway to the goal before the drive began.

The idea that so much scholarship money would be available to students who attend school here is staggering. It would provide all students with the chance to receive an education, regardless of their financial status. Scholarships will be both need-based and merit-based, so the fund would become the great equalizer, granting scores of students the opportunity to learn and grow.

Naturally, this would have the effect of bringing talented students to K-State for their education. It guarantees that qualified applicants will receive one of the best deals in the country. We welcome all students and want them to be a part of this community.

Giving donations for scholarships as opposed to giving a donation for a building certainly creates less of a monument to the donor. However, it carries much of the same benefits, with the added bonus of providing a person with an education. The depths of gratitude for such an act are bottomless.

We would caution, however, that K-State try not to spread its donors too thin. The faculty-salary issue still haunts us, as do funding problems at Hale Library.

What good are our scholarships if we can't provide a decent education?

Several other projects that require alumni support are pending, so it seems wise that we try our best to coordinate efforts to resolve our difficulties now, while they still loom on the horizon.

The only concern is that the issues we need to recognize constantly — faculty salaries and the library — will continue to be problems if we perpetually are turning to other projects. Couldn't we have money for the library if we attacked it with the same vigor as the scholarship drive?

In the end, the revenue from increased attendance at K-State would help to relieve some of these issues. The Foundation is providing us with quite a service, nevertheless.

IT'S JUST THAT SIMPLE

It's way too easy to lose track of important things in quest for success

VIEWPOINT

MARY RENEE SMITH

Simplify your life. Get in touch with your spirit. Find your true self. Consume less. Stop worrying about success and be happy with who you are. Don't sweat the small stuff.

These mantras from the summer of love have been revamped and jazzed up for the coming millennium. Everywhere you look — magazine racks, bookstores and TV talk shows, the gospel of the simple life can be heard. Everywhere, that is, except for K-State.

A mathematical measurement of just how small this stuff is, is easy. Your entire university education is boiled down to a single number between 1 and 4. I know people who sweat the difference between a 2.99 and 3.0 grade point average. I'm no math wiz, but that is one hundredth of a point. Pretty small stuff.

College is all about learning to consume. Buy more books. Buy more supplies. Buy more K-State merchandise. Buy a thick packet for every class, and don't forget those lab supplies. Buy T-shirts and sweatshirts and shot glasses and jackets and pins and paddles and dresses and suits for your sorority or fraternity.

Get a few more credit cards so you can consume now, even though you can't afford it. The push to consume continues through graduation with invitations, announcements, cards, robes, tassels and mounting that all-powerful degree.

The degree: your ticket to consume more, sweat all the small stuff, and fight and claw your way to success. Not necessarily happiness, but success.

There is a career fair Tuesday. There will be hundreds if not thousands of students dressed up and worried about success. They will leave their comfortable jeans, nose ring, personal beliefs and most of their true personality at home to climb into a skirt and jacket and pretend to be really interested about some grommet factory in east Michigan.

The university would like us all to be successful, at least in a way it can measure. It is no secret that successful alumni give back to the university.

Individual colleges keep track of where their graduates find employment. The more graduates who gain enslavement at large corporations, the more fresh-faced freshman the college can get in the door with the promise that someday they will have their very own cubicle, too. It is the circle of life.

Kedzie Hall has a trophy case in the hall with a list of alumni, where they are and in what position they are now employed. If I decide to be a freelance writer for a living, I doubt my name will go on that list. There is just not enough prestige or money in working for yourself; it doesn't matter if I am happier than the guy working at The Washington Post.

Unless, of course, I make enough money to give a contribution to the scholarship fund.

The generation above us, the corporate slaves whose promising future we came here to chase for ourselves, is buying books like "Simplify your life," by Elaine St. James. The book includes chapters like "If it's not easy, don't do it" and "Stop being a slave to your Day Runner."

It's time for us to listen to our elders.

Gramatica's field goal teaches columnist lesson

VIEWPOINT

CORBIN H. CRABLE

Last week at the K-State football game against Northern Illinois, I learned a lesson. Not just a little, "Ooo, I never knew that" kind of lesson, but a real, honest, "you bet 'cher sweet bippy" life lesson.

It happened immediately following Martin Gramatica's 65-yard field goal. I was looking down at the time, carefully unshelling a peanut with my clumsy hands, when the crowd suddenly exploded into a mass of ecstatic screams, zealous shouting and sporadic high-fives. I looked down at the field to see Gramatica being dog-piled by his fellow players; I gazed out into the crowd to see the enthusiastic yelling, almost unaware of my own excitement.

You see, I never used to get excited at any athletic event. Come to think of it, save K-State football games, I never even attend athletic events.

But at that moment, I felt a warm, mushy feeling as I basked in the pure thrill that radiated from the people around me.

Or maybe it was the body odor due to the heat.

Nevertheless, I realized shortly after the historic field goal heard around the world that all of the apathy, and almost contempt, that I held for athletics was simply the result of my years of stubbornness. Ever since I came to K-State, I've learned to enjoy football and other athletic events not for the event itself, but for the way it draws a diverse group of people together. While I don't understand a word of the terminology, rules, positions or anything else in the world of football, I always enjoy seeing people of different backgrounds coming together to enjoy the thrill of sport.

When I was a child and it was cool for the boys to play football or baseball, I was sitting around writing stories and letting my imagination keep me busy. Call it nerdy, but I was a lover of writing and books at age seven, and I don't regret this at all.

I feel somewhat ashamed, however, for what happened in the years following. I came to hate athletes and athletics in junior high and high school. I didn't see athletes for what they are: leaders. Call it jealousy, or whatever you like, but all I knew was that they were something I was not.

As for athletics, all I could understand was that football involved a bunch of big, sweaty men chasing a hunk of pigskin. I found it to be almost barbaric and looked down upon those who played it. Once again, this might be some kind of unconscious jealousy, although I still can't remember ever being jealous of athletes. If any psychology majors can fill me in on this mystery, my e-mail address is at the end of this column.

Thankfully, I found all of my previous misconceptions and angry feelings toward athletics to be wrong when I came to K-State. I learned that while I still don't understand sports, I enjoy them. There's just something about giving a high-five to a total stranger after a K-State touchdown that is invigorating.

Sports is one of the one common links between different people. Let's face it, we are a society that puts a heavy emphasis on sports; this newspaper and probably every newspaper in creation devotes an entire page to sports. I even dare to wonder what our world would be like without sports. Most of the competition in life would certainly be gone.

The bottom line is, I want to be able to attend a K-State football game and cheer just as loud as anyone else. I want to enjoy the fleeting moments of camaraderie between people who otherwise wouldn't give each other the time of day. I already enjoy the high-priced, high-calorie food at the games, so that's a start.

I'd like to salute all of K-State's athletes for being leaders in our university and community and for giving K-State students so much to cheer about. I'd also like to thank Martin Gramatica for putting K-State football in the history books once again, and I now proudly can say I'm glad I could witness history. It was quite an honor to be there.

I plan on attending as many football games as possible now, but be warned: As the words "That's good for another Wildcat first down!" go booming throughout the KSU Stadium, look for the guy who's pointing in the opposite direction of everyone else.

Large corporations continue to focus on profits, not people

VIEWPOINT

TODD PACEY

Last week in my Ethics of Mass Communications class, we learned the Disney Corporation had a profit of $415 million between April and June, and they had to apologize to stockholders for such low earnings.

"Uh, sorry about the $400 million we made ya, we'll do better next time."

In that same time period, Time Warner made a $248 million profit. These are not sales figures; this is the excess money these corporations made after taxes. It is not due to their high sales, but rather their high prices.

We learned the reasoning behind these enormous profit expectations was so corporations can invest in the future. This would make sense, realizing technology is always changing, but these earnings are not all spent on new technological developments.

Will the real Mr. Rip Yuhof please rise?

These corporations work in guise. Disney owns, among other things, a major-league baseball team, the California Angels; a professional hockey team, the Anaheim Ducks; and the American Broadcasting Company (ABC), which has the show "Boy Meets World," which I watch.

If I were part of the Neilsen family, that would mean something.

The point is, you never know where your money is going. Companies are being bought out as if they were K-State season football tickets.

I would've done it, if I didn't have to wait in line for three hours.

The chains go so high up and are so intertwined that it would take a book to explain who owns what, but the next day that book would have to be rewritten.

Which brings me to another rant/point: What's the difference?

I agree with my colleague Jason Rucker, who called advertising a disease, but I disagree that this has led us to become mindless consumers. I like some of the music in the GAP commercials, but I will never buy anything from there. I believe advertisements are simply a write-off.

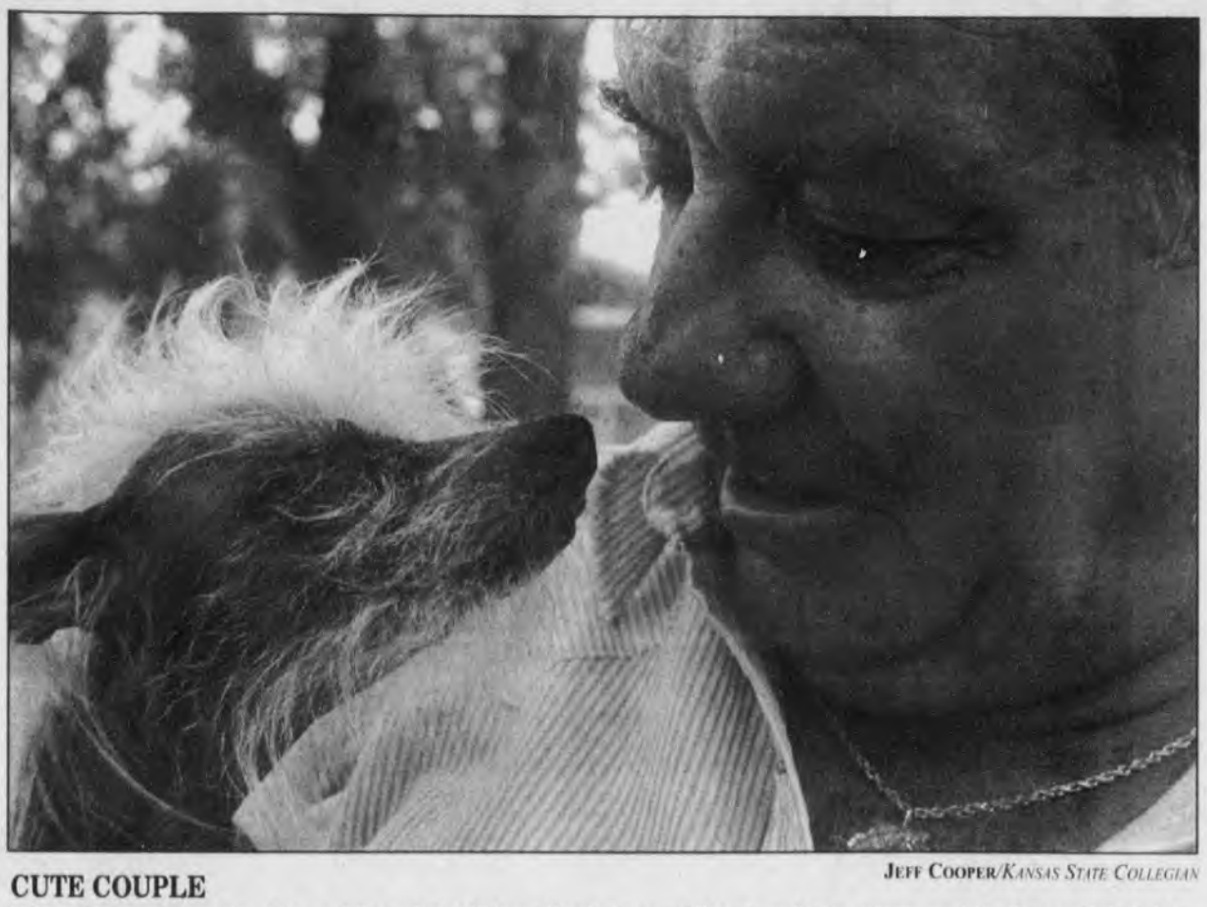
Don't get me wrong; nothing's wrong with stores advertising the prices of their products. Ads are meant to inform consumers of sales or new products. Is there actually anyone who has not heard of Coke or Pepsi Cola?

What is this refreshing carbonated beverage?

There is still a cola war going on, but it's fought at the fast-food chains and restaurants. There are few food places were you have a choice of Coke or Pepsi. Most have contracts with one company or another.

There are no Coke or Pepsi ads; they're just reminders.

Nothing really changes, except maybe the designs. These commercials remind you, as if you have forgotten, that they're still around. To me, these forms of reminder are simply a way to lose some money. The more money these companies spend, the lower their profits are, hence the lower their taxes.



Hey, who needs another $100 million when you've already got $400 million?

Fortunate or not, we are not subject to such horrors in Manhattan. We live in a more rural setting, free from large corporations, apart from the military. Most of the time the big wigs who receive our money reside in Manhattan, Kan., not New York.

Sure we have Burger King, KFC and Taco Bell, but we also have Bob's Diner, Rock-A-Belly Deli and Little Apple Brewing Company. We have commercial chains, but we also have places we can call our own. I do not know for how long.

Once again, just the ramblings of someone tired of paying 15 bucks for a $2 CD.

Someday K-State students might be able to attend classes without leaving the comfort of their beds because of the work being done by the Information Technology Assistance Center (iTAC).

iTAC promotes K-State development through advances in technology.

"We give the faculty ideas on how to incorporate more effective technology into their teaching curriculum," iTAC Director Jeanette Harold said.

iTAC had the first of its two open houses Friday.

"We hold two open houses — one in the spring and one in the fall. Spring open house features work by faculty — the fall is designed for acquainting faculty with the tools and software themselves," Harold said.

Faculty and staff were invited to the open house, which featured demonstrations and examples of video-conferencing technology.

"I don't really see myself using it," David Grath, professor of history , said. "But that's because I come from a small school where we didn't even have PowerPoint. All this stuff is amazing."

Other demonstrations dealt with using the Internet and other computer resources for class instruction, including live lectures.

"Live lectures are lectures that would allow for a professor to say he would be in his office between, say, 1 and 4," Harold said. "Teachers could then sit in front of their computer, and their students could hear and see their teacher over the computer. The students could then ask any questions just by typing them in."

"The technology classrooms have a projection unit and multimedia computer, some with streaming video," IAC Manager Faye Kennedy said.

Kennedy said Eisenhower Hall has the newest technology classroom on campus.

"This is the first semester people are using the technology classroom in Eisenhower," Kennedy said. "It allows for a lot more interaction — the teacher has a wireless mike, so they can walk around the classroom. There are also 40 PCs, and the projector will project 3-D objects," Kennedy said.

The technology classrooms can make it easier to give a lecture to hundreds of students. Students said they appreciate the technology.

"The computer-projection screen is great for taking notes, and the projector helps provide a hands-on look at experiments," Jason Evans, freshman in agronom, said.

Harold said iTAC's main objective is to offer a wide variety of services to faculty and staff as well as students.

"We provide a free service where faculty and staff can check out equipment to use on campus," she said. "We also provide free training for faculty, staff and students in Fairchild 202."

Popular operating system gaining ground on Gates' Microsoft

By Tim Richardson
Kansas State Collegian

Microsoft's stranglehold on the computer operating-systems market might be losing its grip slowly to Linux.

With nearly 10 million users, the Linux operating system still is far behind Windows, though it seems to be gaining ground.

"It's been real popular with computer geeks and is getting more mainstream," Brad Guenther, K-State computer-information specialist, said.

Computer programmers have used Linux for years, but recent agreements with market powers in the software industry are putting the operating system in the public eye.

Guenther said Red Hat Software has made Linux easy to install. Computer software developer Oracle Corp. also is releasing software applications for Linux.

"I know a lot of people who are anti-Microsoft and said they would completely replace it with Linux," Guenther said.

Tim Bower, manager of computer systems for the Department of Computing and Information Sciences, said he prefers Linux or Unix to Windows.

He said Linux is being used in research on campus, primarily by graduate students.

"What would take you hours to do in Windows would take minutes to do in Linux," he said.

One reason for the increased popularity of Linux is its cost — it's free. The source code, which is used for compiling in machine code, is also free. This means information is available to anyone who wants to write a Linux program.

"It brings you back to the old days when the source codes were free," Bower said.

Guenther said Linux is a more stable operating system than Windows.

"It's a lot more stable," he said. "I won't say I have never crashed a Linux box, but I had to work at it."

The stability also makes networking a Linux strong point. The operating system often comes with a variety of networking tools as standard equipment. Guenther said it allows a lot more control in networking.

Linux also has had some success among Internet Service Providers, though a local ISP owner said Linux's security problems keep it from being viable in his business.

"It's getting better, but as soon as someone finds a security hole, it's published all over the Internet," said Dennis Haza, owner of Flinthills Internet in Manhattan.

Haza said he uses Linux at home and is happy with the program, but free software should not be used when running a professional service.

"It's a great operating system. It's a lot of fun," he said. "But we will never run it here."

Masaaki Mizuno, associate professor of computer science, said Microsoft's dominance in the market will make success of the Linux operating system nearly impossible.

He said businesses want a warranty or guarantee that the products it uses will function properly — something Linux doesn't provide.

"All of the industries I know are moving to Windows," Mizuno said.

He said that although he rarely uses anything other than Linux, new users are not being introduced to the operating system. If this trend continues, he said the system might become obsolete.

Mizuno said the complexity of Windows for computer programming makes Linux a more attractive option.

"I'd rather teach Linux, because the internal operation is quite open to the public," he said.

Despite Linux's recent success, it has yet to reach mass appeal, particularly because of a lack of available applications for the operating system.

Guenther said Microsoft routinely might make applications for Linux if its market size has a large increase, but Microsoft should not be too worried about losing its status as the top operating-system manufacturer in the world.

"It will take quite a bit of time for Linux to become a real threat," he said.

Ricky Williams, Texas offense shut down by K-State's 'Lynch Mob' defense

BY SAM FELSENFELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Different week, same old story.

K-State (3-0 overall, 1-0 in Big 12 Conference play) dominated its opponent on the football field — this time, Texas (1-2, 0-1) — and rolled to a huge halftime lead — this time, 35-0. The team coasted to a huge win — this time, 48-7.

The only difference is that this time, the Wildcats answered critics who said they needed to prove they could play against legitimate competition. K-State's Lynch Mob defense entered the game facing its toughest test of the year, Texas running back Ricky Williams.

Williams, the early Heisman Trophy favorite and a likely top-five pick in next April's NFL draft, entered the game having rushed for 375 yards and nine touchdowns. He also runs behind a line, averaging 6 feet 5 inches, 310 pounds.

However, the Cats held him to 43 yards on 25 carries, with no touchdowns and a fumble.

Relying on strong play from the secondary, K-State constantly put eight or nine men on the line of scrimmage.

"They just kept coming and coming," Williams said. "Usually, most teams with good defenses like that only play seven because they think they're good enough to do it. It's really tough when a good defense puts eight men in the box."

The Cats were so dominating on defense they held the powerful Texas ground game to only 53 yards on the day, K-State's lowest yield on the ground of the season.

K-State's third-string running back, Marlon Charles, who didn't touch the ball until the fourth quarter, outgained Williams on the day with 44 yards on 10 carries.

BISHOP

"You just have to key-in on everything you have to do," K-State linebacker Jeff Kelly said. "We are a good defense when we come out and do what we are supposed to do, and it showed."

The Lynch Mob also forced four turnovers, a pair of interceptions and two fumbles. The interceptions gave the Cats six picks through three games, eclipsing the total of five the 1997 team had throughout the entire season.

"I'm just upset about the two interceptions," Texas quarterback Major Applewhite said. "Anytime you throw two interceptions and turn the ball over two times with fumbles, you're not going to do well as a team."

When the Longhorns weren't turning over the ball, they didn't have much luck moving it. Texas managed only one drive longer than seven plays all day, and had nine drives of four or fewer plays.

In addition to the defense, K-State's special teams continued to play well Saturday. The Cats' special-teams units scored their fourth touchdown through three games.

David Allen brought a punt back 93 yards for a touchdown, the third-straight game he's had a return for a score. Allen racked up 172 yards on punt returns, setting a K-State and Big 12 single-game record. Even though he's only in his sophomore season, he moved past Mitch Running into first place on the all-time K-State career punt-return yardage charts.

GARCIA

While Allen did a fine job setting the Cats up with field position on offense, punter James Garcia helped pin the Horns deep into their own territory when K-State failed on offense.

Garcia averaged 60.3 yards on four punts, including a career-best 78 yarder and a 67-yarder into the wind.

"He's amazing," Texas head coach Mack Brown said. "That punter was just killing it into the wind."

To make the blowout complete, K-State's offense performed just as well as its defense and special-teams units early on.

For the third-straight game, the Cats took the lead for good after the first drive of the game, moving down the field for a touchdown after taking the opening kickoff.

Allen enjoys record-setting day

BY JOHN BERGGREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

David Allen is making history quietly.

Shadowed by the Martin Gramaticas, the Michael Bishops, the 100-yard Eric Hickson running games and the 11-reception performances of Darnell McDonald, Allen is silently on pace to shatter every punt record there is.

He did it again Saturday. This time, he returned a punt for 93 yards, the second-longest punt return in school history. He did it for the third time in as many games.

Allen had four returns for 172 yards to set both a Big 12 Conference and school record Saturday. In doing so, he surpassed Mitch Running to become the all-time career punt-return yardage leader with 796 yards, burying Running's old mark, set at 625 yards. Allen now just needs one more return to tie the NCAA record for punt returns in a season, which is held by five players.

Allen's 93-yard tap dance came at the 9:38 mark in the second quarter. He ran around Texas' two initial defenders and then broke four tackles en route to score the touchdown. Allen said the play happened so fast he barely could remember exactly what had occurred.

"It just all happens in the momentum of the game," Allen said. "You just do what you have to do to get into the end zone, and it happens so fast you don't even feel them trying to tackle you."

That return wasn't the only one that began inside K-State's own 10-yard-line against the Longhorns. Allen's first return on the day began at the K-State five; he then brought it out to the K-State 32. Though most punt returners let balls kicked that deep in their own territory go into the end zone for a touchback, Allen said he will return punts no matter where he is on the field.

"I feel like I could field the ball anywhere, no matter where it is," Allen said. "Just because the way the guys block, I have all the faith in the world in them. No matter where it's at, I feel like I can field the ball and do something with it when they're blocking for me."

K-State coach Bill Snyder said he shares that same confidence.

"He has the freedom to run the ball out inside the 10 because he's proven he can do that on more than one occasion," Snyder said. "It's a matter of trust in

Ripken pulls self from lineup, ends consecutive-games streak at 2,632

By DAVID GINSBURG
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BALTIMORE — The Streak is apparently over.

After 16 years and 2,632 consecutive games, Cal Ripken took himself out of the Baltimore Orioles' starting lineup Sunday night and was not expected to play — ending the most amazing iron-man record in sports history with just one week left in the season.

The 38-year-old third baseman said he was not hurt, but with the Orioles out of playoff contention and playing their final home game against the New York Yankees, Ripken decided to end the string that began on May 30, 1982.

An Orioles source said Ripken, who had started every game during his streak, was not planning to play Sunday night.

The end came during a magical season that has featured the historic home-run chase between Mark McGwire and Sammy Sosa, a perfect game by David Wells and the Yankees' pursuit of the AL record for victories.

"What Cal did is so unbelievable. That's one record I do think that will be around for a generation," baseball commissioner Bud Selig said. "What he's done, he's done a great thing for baseball."

There had been recent talk that Ripken would volunteer to end the streak, which broke Lou Gehrig's record of 2,130-straight games. Before the game, Ripken walked into Miller's office and asked to have his name removed from the lineup. Rookie Ryan Minor started in his place.

"Five minutes before the game, I saw Ripken's name on the lineup card, so this is a shock," said Minor's mother, Nancy, who was watching on television from Oklahoma.

"This is history."

One out into the game, when it became evident that Ripken would not be playing, all of the Yankees walked to the top step of the dugout and applauded.

Ripken emerged from the Orioles dugout, tipped his hat toward the Yankees and stepped back down to the bench.

With the sellout crowd standing and cheering, Ripken came out again and bowed to his fans.

"He's got great vision, and his lateral movement is so good," Snyder said. "He changes directions so well, and the vision that he has allows him to anticipate creases, and he does a nice job of setting blocks up. The things he does are just natural to him."

The fact that Allen is well on-track to break the NCAA return record isn't factoring into anything he does. He said the records are not necessarily on his mind when waiting to run back a punt.

ALLEN

"I know how special it is to return three punts in three games, but when I go out on the field, I don't even think about what happened last week or the week before. I just try to score on every punt." he said.

VICTORY

This time, running back Eric Hickson scored on a 44-yard scamper through the Horns' defense, breaking several tackles on the way to the end zone. Hickson finished the day with 124 yards on 16 carries.

Quarterback Michael Bishop had his finest day of the season, passing the ball, completing 14 of 20 passes for 182 yards, two touchdowns and no interceptions.

"Mike was a little more accurate today. He threw the ball well and made some good decisions," K-State coach Bill Snyder said.

Darnell McDonald caught 11 of those passes for 159 yards. The 11 receptions set a career high for McDonald and was the fifth-best single-game performance in K-State history, while the yardage was the tenth-best one-game showing in the Cats' history.

"Darnell plays well and played well today," Snyder said. "He really helps us move the ball down the field with his outstanding catches."

Meth smugglers using Kansas roads

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — Kansas highways have become popular routes for methamphetamine smugglers from Mexico, Texas and southern California, authorities said.

Just five years ago, such illegal cargo in Kansas was deemed rare, but law officers now say Kansas roads are among the most popular drug-movement routes north to Kansas City, Mo., Nebraska, Iowa and South Dakota.

Authorities said Mexico, Texas and California are the source of 75 percent of the meth — a potent, easily made and highly addictive stimulant — in Kansas.

Kansas is not alone. Across the border in Missouri, law officers have recognized a pronounced meth problem for several years. In Nebraska, total seizures grew from less than 2 pounds in 1993 to 290 pounds last year.

Meth shipments crossing Kansas have been found to be stashed in recreational vehicles, in secret compartments in cars, even inside cows.

Kansas highways are so popular that, according to state and federal law-enforcement agencies, the state ranks between No. 10 and No. 15 nationwide in meth smuggling. In 1993, the Kansas Highway Patrol seized 5.5 pounds of meth; last year it confiscated 58 pounds, mainly along Interstate 70.

By contrast, California officials have seized 600-plus pounds so far this year. That state ranks No. 1.

To stem the flow, the Kansas Highway Patrol has increased training to help troopers find drugs during routine traffic stops; road-weary smugglers sometimes give themselves away with something as simple as an illegal U-turn. The patrol also has increased the use of drug-sniffing dogs. In the mid-1980s, Kansas had none of the animals. Now it has 125.

For all their efforts, police said they are lucky if they catch 10 percent of the meth traffic. The patrol has found only 18 pounds so far this year.

"They're not smuggling less. They're just getting smarter," Lt. Kirk Simone said.

Five years ago, federal, state and local authorities confiscated nearly 10 pounds of meth annually from drug couriers traveling the state's roadways. Last year, the total was almost 100 pounds. This year, authorities said they expect the amount to reach 150 pounds.

That 150 pounds is a small fraction of the whole, said a KBI agent who used to work undercover. He said he knows of one group of dealers who hauled 100 pounds a week through Kansas. "We are just talking one group of many."

they could combine the fairs into one. A task force was assembled, and 18 months later, the all-university career fair was formed.

Organizers said this year's fair will be bigger than ever, with more than 300 businesses and services and more than 800 employees from the different companies attending.

"The career fair is the biggest in the Big 12," Shuley said.

The fair will help graduating seniors find employment, Shuley said.

"Companies are there to hire people, and it is an opportunity for graduating seniors to meet the guy who graduated last year," Shuley said.

Hopkins said he is attending the fair to make himself more marketable.

"To be competitive in the job market, internships and job experience are keys to success," Hopkins said.

Amanda Hagler, freshman in marketing and international business, said she agreed.

"It is a good place to start networking and meet business people," Hagler said.

to make it easier for someone to go to school."

That sentiment was echoed by many in attendance.

John Perrier, a 1939 graduate from Dodge City, Kan., gave a gift to the College of Agriculture to establish a scholarship.

"The cost of education is getting high, and a lot of these students need a little financial support," Perrier said. "Feeding the world is one of the most important jobs in the world. We have to develop agricultural scientists to do that."

Doris Miller is leading the scholarship campaign for the College of Arts and Sciences.

"My father was killed in World War II, and the only reason I got to go to school was a scholarship for war veteran's children, so I think the scholarship campaign is important," Miller said. "I hope everyone leaves with the idea they have to do something for the scholarship campaign."

engineering was friends with Robben. Dowell said Robben was quiet but that his close friends knew him well.

"We formed a circle of friends with the guys in our residence hall last year. We knew that Robben was a nice guy. He was easy going and laid back. This is a tough time, but we're holding together," Dowell said.

Locally, Robben was a member of the National Society of Professional Engineers and St. Isidore's Catholic Church in Manhattan.

The funeral will be at 11 a.m. Tuesday at St. Joseph's Catholic Church in Oakley. Memorials can be made to the St. Joseph's Parish Youth Choir and to St. Joseph's School, both in Oakley.

The accident is still under investigation by the RCPD.

"I'm almost willing to say, 'Let's stipulate that President Clinton touched Monica Lewinsky where he shouldn't have,'" Rep. Robert Wexler, D-Fla., said on NBC.

Two sources familiar with the material Starr turned over to Congress told the Associated Press it includes an FBI interview report of an Arkansas woman, 55, whom Jones' lawyers sought to question about possible sexual misconduct by the president two decades ago.

The sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the FBI report is inconclusive about whether anything improper happened, declining to be more specific. The report is not among the materials scheduled for release today.

In an event unparalleled in history, the unfiltered footage of the president's grand jury testimony will be aired by cable news channels simultaneous with its release, expected shortly after the breakfast hour today. To prepare viewers, CNN aired special statements Sunday warning that the video, which it plans to run in its entirety, contains "both language and descriptions" that "may be offensive to some viewers and unsuitable to children."

Congress risked a political backlash by releasing a videotape that 52 percent of Americans said they planned to watch but that 69 percent felt was unnecessary to release, according to a CBS survey.

The CBS poll indicated Congress' approval rating had dropped from 56 percent earlier last week to 44 percent, and that 59 percent of the public believed the tape's release had more to do with embarrassing the president than letting the public judge him. The White House sharpened its attack Sunday along those lines.

"They (lawmakers) decided that rather than just doing a document dump, they would do a garbage dump on Monday, and I think people are going to wonder about that," White House Deputy Chief of Staff John Podesta said.

Though only Clinton will be visible on the videotape, which was made as part of a closed-circuit TV feed from the White House map room to the federal court house, the public also will get its first glimpse of the conduct of Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's prosecutors whose work has been conducted in the secrecy of the grand jury.

Four prosecutors can be heard posing questions to the president, frequently using graphic sexual terms and even starting off the entire question with a debate over the oath the president had just taken.

Lawmakers who already viewed the tape sought to lower expectations about its long-term political effect. "Frankly, large portions of it are rather boring," Rep. Asa Hutchinson, R-Ark., told ABC.

"If you like the president, there are going to be times when you feel sympathy for him," Graham, a conservative Republican, said. "If you think he is a guy you don't like, there are going to be things you seize upon, but it is not going to be a knockout blow."

Rep. Marty Meehan, D-Mass., another House Judiciary Committee member, said he agreed. "I don't think it will have a great positive or negative effect," he told ABC.

At times combative and evasive, Clinton also lets his guard down on occasion during the testimony, according to one lawyer familiar with it.

At one point he spoke of the pain of having to acknowledge under oath in his Jan. 17 Paula Jones deposition having "sexual relations" with Gennifer Flowers, the Arkansas woman whose allegation of an affair nearly derailed his 1992 presidential bid.

He also expressed regret that Lewinsky, now 25, had been embroiled in the Starr investigation. He portrayed himself as a concerned friend who, after their sexual contact ended, still tried to help find her a new job and to help her avoid having to testify in the Jones sexual harassment lawsuit.

Pomeroy OPUS wins

Pomeroy, a local funk/reggae-style group, captured the $400 first prize Friday during the 12th annual OPUS Band Competition in the free-speech zone. The event was presented by Union Program Council's Eclectic Entertainment Committee.

Pomeroy member David Fairbanks said the prize money would be used to help the band get more exposure.

"We will be using the money to pay for our demo tapes and for getting back into the studio so we can put out our full-length compact disc by next semester," he said.

Pomeroy drummer Chris Davis was pleased by the crowd participation.

"It was great to see so many people getting into our music," he said.

Five judges scored six bands in four categories, including originality of music and audience appeal.

"It's just great to come out and support the local-music scene," Judge John Leach said.

Second-place winnings of $250 went to Beggar's Table, who played a self-described blend of "acoustic, alternative folk rock."

The judges of the band competition scored the bands on originality, instrumental ability, vocal ability, stage presence and audience appeal.

Mercy Brown won $150 for third place.

Travis Lutz, junior in chemical engineering, attended the contest and said he enjoyed seeing new faces.

"A lot of the bands sounded very similar, but it was good to hear some local bands I was not familiar with," Lutz said.

Other students said they were pleased with the location.

"The free-speech zone was a great place to hold this event. It was nice to be outside in good weather," said Erica Mulryan, junior in social work.

UPC Eclectic Entertainment chairman Alex Stucky said he was glad so many students attended.

"I am very pleased," he said. "The crowd this year was a lot better than last year, since it was outside again."

Dean Hopkins, sophomore in business, plays bass Friday evening in the free speech zone as part of the band Pomeroy during the Opus Band Competition.

Still afloat: 'Back To Titanic' offers fans even more music

Music Review

out of 5 stars

BY JEFF ELLIOT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

James Cameron, director of the box-office giant "Titanic," is trying to touch our hearts and pocketbooks once again.

Cameron and his team of marketing geniuses seem determined to keep the "Titanic" craze alive as long as possible. In addition to the September release of the film on home video, a second movie soundtrack is available.

"Back To Titanic," which contains additional "Titanic" music composed and conducted by James Horner, delivers a masterful piece of symphonic storytelling that is better than the original Academy Award-winning soundtrack.

The most impressive track on the album is the "Titanic Suite," which is a compilation of all of the "Titanic" themes mixed into one 17-minute score. This piece is very powerful and is enough to cause any "Titanic" loyalist to buy the album.

Another highlight on the soundtrack is "The Portrait," a piano ballad performed by Horner of "My Heart Will Go On." This track is the background music for the scene when Jack is drawing an unclothed Rose.

The only drawback of "Back to Titanic" is the new version of "My Heart Will Go On." In an attempt to add more feeling and emotion to the hit love theme, Horner incorporates dialogue into the song and almost ruins it.

The selection of hoppy, unnatural dialogue sequences from the movie fills the gaps between the verses. Most listeners will be turned off by this.

Aside from a few flaws, "Back To Titanic" does an excellent job of retelling the famous love story between Rose and Jack. As in the original "Titanic" soundtrack, the orchestration is phenomenal.

"Back to Titanic" is an album that fans of the movie and of classical music most certainly will enjoy.

'La Tania' forced to cancel date at McCain Auditorium

BY DIANA LEE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The McCain Performance Series has announced that a scheduled Oct. 30 appearance by La Tania, a flamenco-dance act, has been canceled.

La Tania, a solo artist who tours with a troupe of musicians and singers, was forced to cancel her schedule of events because one of the acts within her show broke its commitment to her touring group.

Emig said the group's entire fall schedule was canceled.

"It really reduced their income to the point that they felt unable to follow through with the schedule at this time," she said.

Emig said McCain hopes to reschedule La Tania sometime in the future.

"We won't be able to have them in the spring, if they will be available, because our schedule is already so full," Emig said. "We are hoping to re-engage them in the 1999 or 2000 schedules."

Emig said McCain does not plan to replace the canceled date with another group. People who have season tickets or who already had purchased tickets for the show are being given three options.

"Those who already have tickets can obtain a refund; they can exchange these tickets for tickets to another McCain show; or they can give the tickets, as a tax deductible gift, to the Friends of McCain," Emig said.

Emig said McCain regrets the cancellation; but acknowledges the normality of the occurrence.

"We're extremely disappointed, but we do know that it is simply the nature of the beast."

Telemarketers target students

BY MIKE WATSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students are prime targets for both sending and receiving telemarketing sales calls.

Clients give telemarketers names and goods or services to sell over the phone. Often, people assume telemarketers are responsible for the calls they receive, said Michele Rene Hart, recruiter for ITI Marketing Services.

However, the calling service seldom generates the list; it just makes the calls.

"ITI has nothing to do with lists," Hart said. "The names are generated by our clients. We have no reason to buy names."

According to Fortune Magazine, ITI, located in Manhattan, is ranked in the top 500 of all telemarketing services. ITI is also the largest telemarketing service in the state.

Depending on the client, telemarketers can be hired by a company to sell a good or service, or they can be hired simply to call people to remind them to vote, Hart said.

However, telemarketers are limited by a variety a federal and state laws designed to protect consumers.

The Federal Telemarketing Sales Rule sets calling hours between 8 a.m. and 9 p.m.

"I would call people sitting down for dinner and on Sunday, times that are just wrong," Jon Bruntz, senior in marketing, said.

Under the Kansas Consumer Protection Act, a telemarketer must promptly terminate the call if consumers indicate they are not interested.

"The responsibility of getting off lists is up to consumers," Hart said. "Your best bet is to contact the vendor and find out who sold your name."

College students are not only vulnerable targets to receive calls but also to make calls.

"We gear towards college students, so we try to hire college students," Hart said.

The work isn't always rewarding, however.

Bruntz stopped working for ITI after only two months on the job.

"It was a miserable, miserable job," Bruntz said. "People would be rude and hang up on you. Clients would hire telemarketers and give you a script in which you're constantly monitored. If you don't follow the scripts, you get reprimanded. You knew what you were doing was rude, but you couldn't do anything about it. It should be abolished."

Although telemarketing facilities are often found in large college towns, it's unlikely that local students receive a call from their own town.

"We try not to call within our own state," Hart said. "You will never have to make a call to someone you know."

With the repetitive nature of the calls, telemarketers sometimes have a hard time handling bad responses from customers, Hart said.

Hart also said it would be best for telemarketers not to take those responses personally.

"That's how I got through it. You don't care how the customer reacts. You'll never see them or talk to them again," she said.

"I feel sorry for telemarketers," Andy Ohmes, senior in biochemistry, said.

"A telemarketer called and asked for a Mr. Pi once. I said, 'Who?' It finally dawned on me. I said, 'Can you read the full name?' She said 'Kappa Phi.' I told her to put it all together. 'Pi Kappa Phi,' she said. What does that sound like? A fraternity?"

Former faculty member's work nets building named in own honor

BY RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Not many K-State faculty members can boast of having helped create the building that honors their name.

Add to that exclusive list Jake Mosier, a member of the College of Veterinary Medicine from 1945 to 1992, who will become a part of K-State's building history when the Veterinary Clinical Sciences Building is renamed Jacob E. Mosier Hall.

"It's humbling, to say the least," Mosier said Sunday, admitting he hasn't had much time to let the reality sink in.

The Kansas Board of Regents unanimously approved the name change last week. The building houses the veterinary-teaching hospital.

Mosier served as building committee chairman for the clinical-sciences building when it was planned, designed and constructed between 1974 and 1979. His career and the rise to prominence of the College of Veterinary Medicine go hand-in-hand.

Mosier received a professional degree from K-State in 1945 and a master of science in 1948. He joined the Department of Surgery and Medicine in 1949. In 1961, he became the department head and director of the Dykstra Veterinary Hospital. He became director of development for the college in 1985. He retired in 1992 but retains emeritus status.

"I think it gives one some sense of gratitude for those who have made this possible — people who have contributed to my career," Mosier said. "The college has always been good to me and so has the university."

Mosier's legacy at the college includes broadening the emphasis of the curriculum to focus on small animals as well as larger ones. Although not officially involved in the college anymore, Mosier recently has accepted the job of chairman of the college's scholarship-campaign committee.

President Jon Wefald, who briefly honored Mosier at Friday night's KSU Foundation scholarship-campaign kick-off, said a dedication could happen this fall or in the spring.

"It's something Provost Jim Coffman and I had been talking about for years," Wefald said.

"It's richly deserved."

Umpire takes away McGwire's No. 66

BY ARNIE STAPLETON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MILWAUKEE — Mark McGwire's home-run total might need an asterisk, after all.

McGwire hit No. 65 to extend his record, then had an apparent No. 66 taken away by an umpire's ruling in the St. Louis Cardinals' 11-6 victory over the Milwaukee Brewers.

"After further review, it looked like it was a home run," McGwire said. "The man who caught the ball, he never came across the yellow line."

Given the unique nature of the Great Home Run Race of 1998, Cardinals manager Tony La Russa said the club is appealing to the National League to make the unprecedented move of reversing second-base umpire Bob Davidson's call and awarding the homer.

"The home-run chase has drawn attention all over the world," La Russa said.

"Most importantly, the way the inning played out, it didn't make any difference."

After McGwire's two-out, disputed double, Brian Jordan singled him home and scored on Ron Gant's home run.

Had McGwire been stranded, "we wouldn't even have asked, because of the integrity of the game," La Russa said.

"They asked us to look at it, and that's all I can say right now," NL spokeswoman Katy Feeney said at Wrigley Field, where she attended "Sammy Sosa Celebration" day.

Feeney said a ruling was expected Monday.

Before Roger Maris set his record of 61 homers in 1961, commissioner Ford Frick declared any record would carry a "distinctive mark" if it did not beat Babe Ruth's mark of 60 in 154 games.

McGwire surpassed Maris on Sept. 8 in his 145th game.

But now Mighty Mac has a footnote of his own.

For now and forever, fans will wonder whether his total should have been one higher.

McGwire, who struck out four times Saturday night, gave St. Louis a 2-0 lead with a 423-foot shot in the first following a single by Fernando Tatis.

McGwire sent a drive into the left-field bleachers, setting off a scramble for the ball.

He said he'd give it back to McGwire: "It's the right thing to do."

McGwire went 3-for-4 with a walk. Needing a triple to hit for the cycle — his last triple came in 1988 — he struck out in the seventh inning and walked in the ninth.

"You have a better chance of winning the lottery than for me to hit a triple," McGwire said.

Chiefs give Leaf rookie's welcome

BY DOUG TUCKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Two days after Ryan Leaf got out of the hospital, his game took a turn for the worse.

The previously undefeated rookie quarterback completed his first throw Sunday in chilly and rainy Arrowhead Stadium, then missed his next 14 and set a San Diego record for passing futility. He also committed five turnovers in his first seven possessions, and the Kansas City Chiefs accepted all his gifts in a sloppy, penalty-filled 23-7 victory over the Chargers.

Leaf wound up 1-for-15 for 4 yards, breaking the team record for fewest completions. The previous record of three was set 23 years ago.

He refused to blame the flu symptoms that hospitalized him overnight Thursday.

"We lost, man. We didn't play well, especially on my part," Leaf said. "I take full blame."

A driving rain fell throughout the first half while the Chiefs took a 16-0 lead over the punchless Chargers (2-1). Rain fell much of the fourth quarter as well.

"The conditions today were as tough as any that I've ever been involved with," Kansas City coach Marty Schottenheimer said. "It was a monster out there."

The Chargers' net passing was minus-19 yards, still better than the team record of minus-22.

"I told him I love him," San Diego linebacker Junior Seau said. "We have to take care of him. He's going to have those hard times. As veterans, we need to support him and protect him."

The Chiefs lost wide receiver Andre Rison to an injury, after he aggravated a pulled hamstring on a 44-yard touchdown reception.

The Chiefs also lost former K-State wide receiver Kevin Lockett, who was ejected along with San Diego's Michael Dumas, when the two got into a shoving incident late in the third period.

The Chiefs drew extra incentive from comments they'd heard that Leaf had made on television about Arrowhead not being as intimidating as everyone said.

"To say that Arrowhead is just another stadium, there was a rude awakening awaiting him today," Chiefs cornerback James Hasty said.

MHS student caught with gun on school grounds

Officials investigating stolen weapon, ammunition found in boy's backpack

By ANDY WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

The Manhattan/Ogden U.S.D. 383 Board of Education will decide Friday how to punish a Manhattan High School sophomore who brought a gun to the school last week.

Jason E. Brinkeroff, 15, of Ogden, Kan., was detained by MHS staff members Friday morning when a routine search of his backpack produced a stolen 9mm handgun and a loaded ammunition clip.

Brinkeroff was taken into custody by the Riley County Police Department for criminal possession of a firearm and possession of stolen property.

On Friday, members of the staff noticed a group of boys loitering in a bathroom while class was going on. The boys were escorted to Principal Sylvester Benson's office, where a routine check of the students' backpacks produced the gun.

Benson said he was glad the weapon was discovered before anyone could be harmed.

"A loaded weapon in a community of 1,400 students and 100 faculty is very dangerous," he said. "We thwarted a disaster."

Brinkeroff is serving a five-day suspension for breaking the school's weapon policy. The hearing on Friday will determine if Brinkeroff will be suspended for an entire school year.

"It's unfortunate that this happened," Benson said. "It was clearly a bad choice by the young man, but I don't want to send a message that you can bring a gun to Manhattan High."

Benson said he was unsure why the weapon was brought to school in the first place.

"Hopefully, we will find out more why the gun was brought," he said. "I think it was just a poor choice."

Benson said the school routinely checks students' backpacks and lockers.

Cory Fisher, MHS senior and student council president, said she was unaware of the incident until the weekend.

"I was surprised. No one ever said anything about it," she said. "A friend told me about it, and then I read it in the paper."

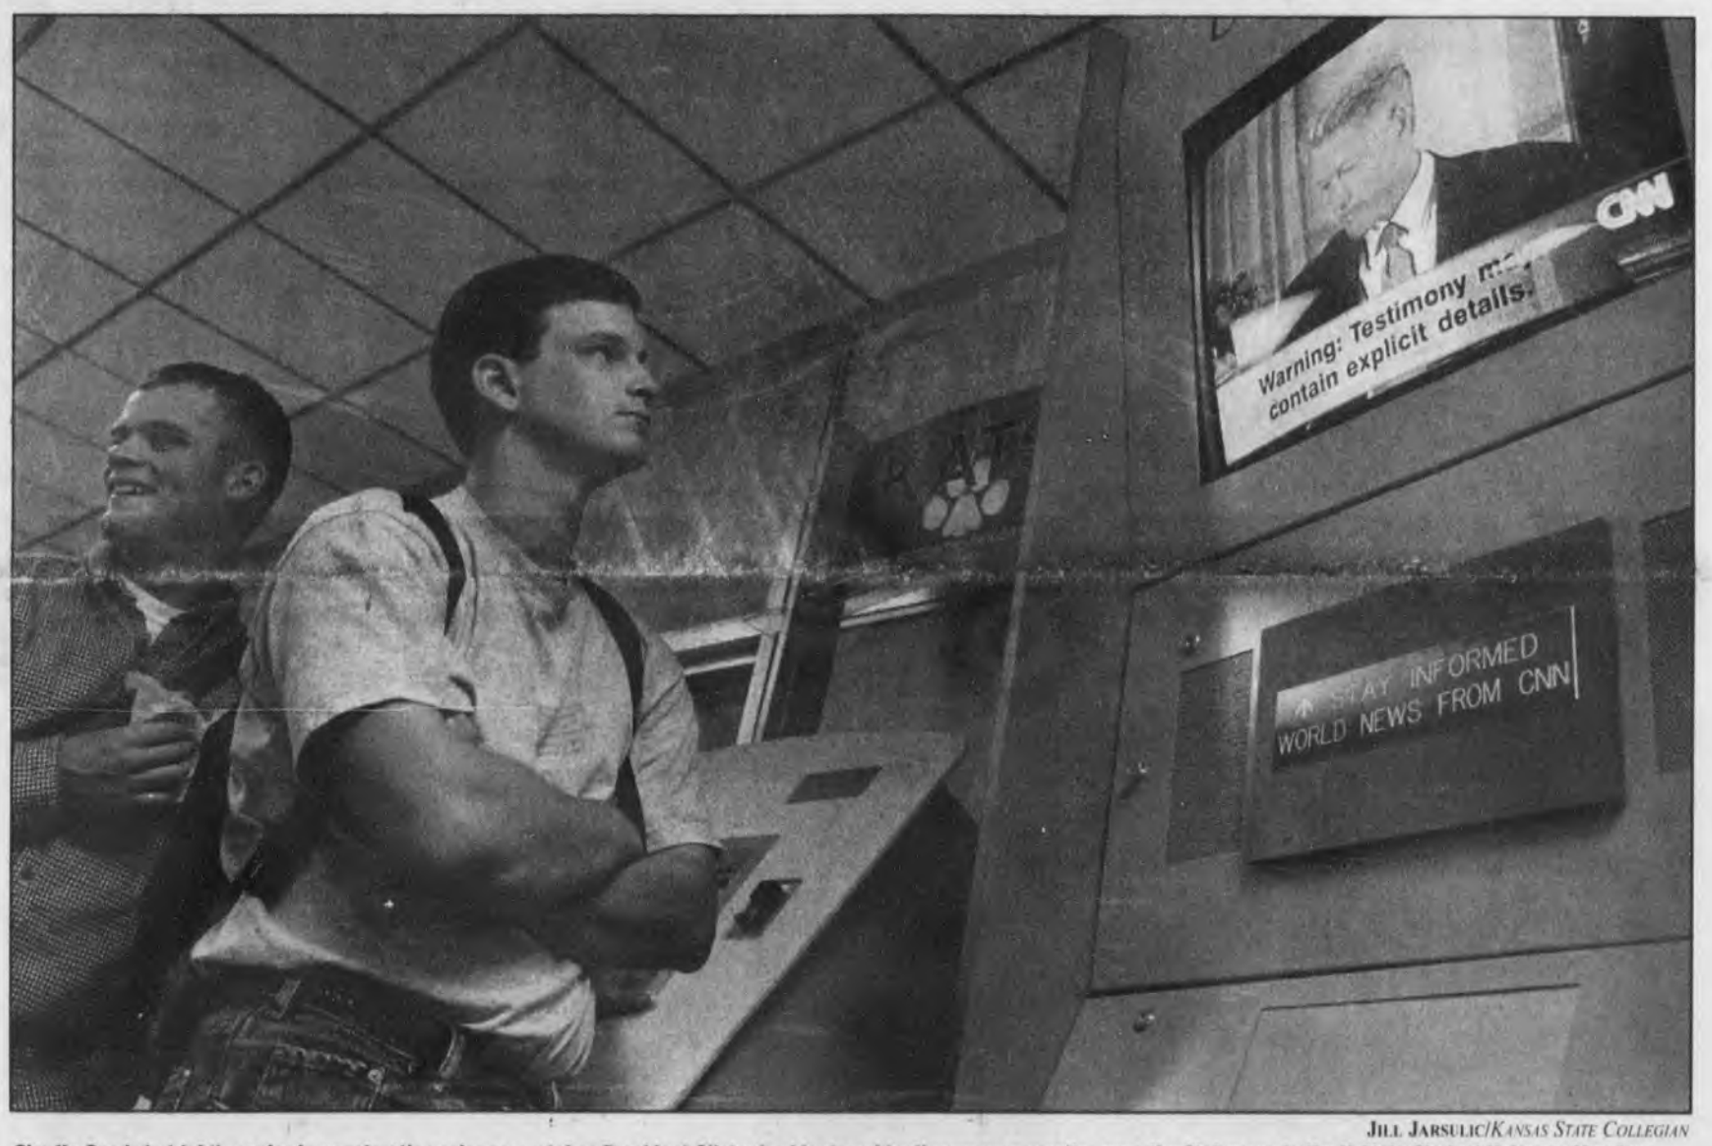
Fisher said the student council addressed the issue of school violence with Benson last year.

"With all of the (national) school shootings last year, we sat down with Mr. Benson and discussed with him what we should do to prevent that from happening here," she said. "We didn't have any great ideas, but we talked. I think Mr. Benson wants to be very proactive on this issue."

After Friday's incident, Fisher said she still feels safe at school.

"Manhattan is a safe school," she said. "I am really proud of our security guards for finding the gun."

RCPD Lt. Herb Crosby said he thought MHS is safe, even after the incident.



"We had an incident last year where a student had a shotgun in his car," he said. "But we believe those to be isolated incidents. I don't see a trend of students bring guns to school in Manhattan."

Officials are unsure how Brinkeroff came into possession of the weapon, which was stolen during an automobile burglary in Pottawatomie County.

"The investigation is still ongoing," Crosby said.

"There could be more charges filed if we turn more up."

A spokesperson for Riley County attorney Bill Kennedy said Brinkerhoff's first date in Riley County District Court has not been set.

Charlie Goodwin (right), senior in construction science, watches President Clinton's videotaped testimony on a monitor near the Stateroom in the K-State Student Union on Monday while Joe Bush, senior in secondary education, laughs about one of Clinton's remarks. "If he had any dignity, he would resign and get it over with," Goodwin said.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — By turns humble and defiant, President Clinton tussled with prosecutors over "the truth of my relationship" with Monica Lewinsky in grand-jury testimony released Monday by Congress and broadcast unedited across a broad spectrum of American television.

"It's an embarrassing and personally painful thing," Clinton said in testimony recorded in secret a month ago and now laid bare to the nation.

The videotape and 3,183 pages of printed material were provided by Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr to augment his report to the House. Republicans in Congress voted to release the material as a prelude to a possible impeachment inquiry.

The public's main focus was on the videotape of Clinton's Aug. 17 appearance before a federal grand jury investigating whether Clinton committed perjury or took other steps to cover up his relationship with former White House intern Lewinsky.

"It's no secret to anybody that I hoped that this relationship would never become public," Clinton said of the episode that has transfixed American politics and threatened his presidency.

While the president repeatedly brushed aside questions about their sexual relationship, Lewinsky described them to the grand jury in sometimes-reluctant detail. "I've always felt that he was sort of my sexual soulmate," she testified in her summertime appearance before the grand jury.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, minimized the day's events.

"I don't expect a meaningful impact on the public's overall impression of the president or the process that's under way," he said. "Based on the expectations built up by both sides, the broadcast failed to register on the Richter scale."

"It should now be clear to everyone ... the president's conduct does not rise to the level of an impeachable offense," presidential spokesman Mike McCurry said. "Still, the White House couldn't feel anything but awful about the day that we have gone through as a nation."

A senior Clinton adviser said White House aides were contacting congressional Democrats, hoping to convince them to speak out in favor of a presidential punishment short of impeachment.

Much of the printed material released Monday was Lewinsky's version of the relationship as she testified over the summer to the same grand jury. Portions of her account had been published last week in Starr's report to Congress.

The president resisted persistent efforts by prosecutors to get him to admit that he committed perjury last January in the Paula Jones lawsuit when he denied "sexual relations" with Lewinsky. Prosecutors expressed exasperation and grand jurors forwarded a question to the president asking on what legal grounds he could refuse to answer the questions.

"Look, I'm not trying to be evasive here. I'm trying to protect my privacy," Clinton said. At another point, he said, "I can't explain why I didn't answer every question in the way you seem to think I should have."

Painfully aware that the video footage "will be forever in the historic annals of the United States," Clinton said he had "to contend with things no previous president

Opinions differ on Clinton video

By JENNIFER LUCKE
Kansas State Collegian

K-State students and faculty had mixed opinions on President Clinton's grand-jury testimony after it was released Monday morning.

Carrie Edwards, freshman in business, said she felt Clinton was dodging questions during the testimony.

Mike Simons, sophomore in open option, said the Monica Lewinsky matter is taking Clinton's attention away from doing his job. He said character is important in a president,and that Clinton's credibility has "gone down the tubes."

Edwards said that if Clinton lied to the grand jury, it is grounds for impeachment, but she said she felt that Clinton would most likely serve the remainder of his term.

"I think he'll get off scott-free," she said.

John Fliter, assistant professor of political science, said he thought there is really no way to know if Clinton will be impeached.

"It's pretty much a political question," Fliter said. "Congress is going to have to Group spends night outside for homeless

By JENNIFER WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

Silver Key members will be sleeping under the stars tonight to raise money for the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

Proceeds from the fourth-annual Silver Key Sleepout go to purchasing supplies the shelter uses to help the homeless in our community.

Silver Key adviser Jack Taylor said the sleepout is a way for students to make a connection with the homeless.

"Even though they have sleeping bags and pillows, it gives students an opportunity to explore in a very, very limited way what homeless have to go through," Taylor said.

He said he sees the sleepout as a way for students to help not only the community, but their fellow students as well.

"Some Manhattan students have gone to the shelter," Taylor said.

Making people aware that homelessness does occur in Manhattan is what Mary Bosco, sophomore in premedicine, nutrition and exercise science, said she wants to accomplish with the all-night sleepout, which will last from 7 p.m. to 7 a.m.

Bosco said each member raises a minimum of $50 and what individuals raise from local businesses, living groups and campus organizations is added to that.

"Our goal for this year is over $2,000," she said.

That money will go to help provide temporary shelter, food, clothing and crisis intervention, to name just a few of the services the shelter provides.

"It is the only service like it in Manhattan," Bosco said. "They do a lot for the community."

Students can serve rural communities with traveling art

By KELLY EVENSON
Kansas State Collegian

Rural Kansans will have something to talk about when paintings by Kansas artist Gerald Moore tour the state, starting in January.

The project, Plowshares to Paintbrushes, will be a co-curricular activity between the K-State Community Service Program and the Kansas Arts Commission.

"Students will arrange exhibits to go to the community. They would also select and work in the communities to see if everything is ready and all the arrangements have been made," said Emily Willis, student coordinator for the Community Service Program.

■ MORE INFO?
For more information on the Plowshares to Paintbrushes program, contact the Community Service Program office in Edwards 8D. Applications will be accepted until all positions are filled.

Through an application process, a team of three to four students will be chosen to work with the traveling exhibit. So far, Willis said there has been a fair number of responses, but she would like to see more.

"They will be providing a service to communities not normally reached. They would also gain leadership skills, organize, plan and get to work with a diverse group of people," she said.

Willis said the kickoff for the tour will be in January with a show at the Kansas Statehouse. From there, the paintings will go to rural communities, which the students will select. The team also will have the opportunity to decide which paintings will be seen in the exhibit.

"It is a hands-on learning experience that is so rare to come by. Students will do everything from the ground up. It is not your typical job," said Regina Tirella, graduate intern in the Community Service Program.

WICHITA — A Wichita teen-ager suspected of shooting a 12-year-old girl as she slept in her home had ties to an Asian gang, police said Monday.

Friends have identified the victim as Na Nguyen, a seventh-grade student at an area middle school. She was pronounced dead at Via Christi Regional Medical Center-St. Francis Campus shortly after Sunday's shooting.

An 18-year-old man was booked on second-degree murder and criminal discharge of a firearm charges in connection with the killing. Police said the man, who had connections to a Wichita gang, was the only one in the car believed to be involved in the drive-by shooting.

Six shots were fired at the house. Only one, which went in through a window, entered the home, striking the girl in bed, said police Lt. Terry Nelson.

Several children, ranging in ages from 9 to 16, were in the house at the time, Nelson said. Police have found no connection among any family members to a gang.

About the same time as the shooting, police got a call about a loud party at a house near the shooting scene.

Acting on a hunch that the two incidents might be connected, officers went to the party, where they found a vehicle that appeared to match the description of the one involved in the shooting, Nelson said.

Nguyen is the third Wichita child killed by random violence in the last two months.

"There's a lot of teenage kids here, but no gang-type actions going on," said Harold Hartley, who lives around the corner from the Nguyens.

Linda Mathur, principal of Mayberry Magnet Middle School, a global education magnet school in Wichita, said Nguyen was a good student, "quiet and shy."

Residents in the upscale neighborhood said they were shocked at the killing.

"This is the first time something like this has happened here," he said. "I've got little ones myself, and its strange to live in a neighborhood and have something like this go on."

Hartley said his son and the Nguyens' younger son, both 10, play together all the time.

"They're a nice family," he said. "I know their children are well-educated and going to special classes because they're smart."

More grounded grain expected in Kansas

TOPEKA — Kansas farmers might end up putting twice as much grain on the ground this fall than last year because of lack of storage space in elevators and increased yields, a task force was told Monday.

"Anytime you have grain on the ground, you have serious problems. Once it is exposed to the elements, there is the risk of loss," Agriculture Secretary Allie Devine said after a meeting of the Governor's Working Group on Grain Storage and Transportation.

She said this year's fall harvest, which is underway in many parts of the state, could create record amounts of grounded grain. The unanswered question, she said, is how long can the grain be kept on the ground without spoilage.

Tom Tunnell, president of the Kansas Grain and Feed Association, told the group there could be as much as 62-million bushels of grain — mostly corn — on the ground, compared to some 30-million bushels last year.

"We literally are facing the prospect of twice the problem as last year," Tunnell said, adding the problem was caused by less storage space, in part because of last year's yields and increased production this year.

He said the estimate assumes 1.14 billion bushels of storage space, minus 453 million bushels of total stock on hand. That leaves some 689-million bushels of available space, but 751-million bushels of wheat, corn, milo and soybeans are expected to be harvested.

Tunnell said those figures also assume that some 400-million bushels of farm storage will be used and that no space is taken up by other crops, such as sunflowers.

Last year, the amount of grounded grain was blamed in some measure on the lack of railroads being able to move the crops in a timely manner because of a lack of shipping cars.

"We are focused on supplying Kansas with equipment," said Donald Oman, general director of the agricultural commodities business unit of Burlington Northern Santa Fe Railway.

He said the railway has nearly 35,000 grain cars, and 2,000 of them were replaced recently with cars capable of carrying more grain.

Viewers of testimony say it's embarrassing

OMAHA, Neb. — Some Omaha residents said they were embarrassed for the president, or weary of yet more lurid details or disgusted by the whole affair — but woe to anyone who tried to change the channel.

"You can't not watch this," Andy King, 23, said as he sat watching President Clinton's grand-jury testimony in a TV lounge at the University of Nebraska at Omaha. "It's on the front page of every newspaper. It's on every station. It is historical."

Americans watched and passed judgment.

There were few surprises in the footage of Clinton's testimony about his affair with Monica Lewinsky, but it wasn't what Clinton said so much as how he said it that many people noticed.

Attorney Bill Schwartz tuned in while exercising at a health club in Sacramento, Calif. The sound was off, so the 52-year-old Schwartz observed Clinton's demeanor with an attorney's eye. He said he didn't like what he saw.

"I think he blinks a lot," Schwartz said. "I think he's uncooperative, he's squirming. He's a nightmare witness."

Galina Lyons, 45, a civil service secretary, watched Clinton at the airport in Norfolk, Va. She said the president looked like "he was trying to get out of it."

Albright, Iran official avoid direct talks

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary of State Madeleine Albright met with Iran's deputy foreign minister and other diplomats Monday in the highest level U.S.-Iranian diplomatic contact in two decades. There were no one-on-one direct talks between the two countries.

The meeting followed a speech by Iranian President Mohammad Khatami to the U.N. General Assembly, in which he called for a dialogue on terrorism, said there could be no military solution in Afghanistan and chided U.S. global influence.

Albright met with Iran's deputy foreign minister, Mohammad Javad Zarif, as part of an eight-nation meeting convened by U. N. Secretary General Kofi Annan to discuss the civil war in Afghanistan and the potential for a war between Afghanistan and Iran.

"I think we as an international community ought to do whatever we can to bring the situation under control, not only internally but to ensure that tensions in the region do not increase," Annan said as he entered the meeting.

Inside, he told the group, "As the war in Afghanistan itself has escalated, so have risks of its becoming a full-scale regional conflict."

Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharazi had been scheduled to attend the eight-nation conference. There was no immediate explanation why Zarif was sent instead.

State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said that because of the urgency of the issue, Albright agreed to participate in the meeting despite the lower-level representation by Iran.

"In our minds, it was not a U.S.-Iran meeting," Rubin said. He acknowledged, however, that had Kharazi attended, there might have been a chance for Albright to have a discussion on the side. That did not occur with Zarif, he said.

Several members of Congress last week urged the Clinton administration to refrain from any goodwill gestures toward Khatami or his government, and a majority in the House of Representatives signed a statement urging continued toughness towards Iran.

CORRECTIONS

A story in the Sept. 15 edition of the Collegian about a date-rape program in Moore Hall contained an error.

Elizabeth Crain, assistant director of the Women's Center, told the audience that she had been asked to scare them about rape, but said she didn't think fear was a solution to ending date rape.

The KSU Career Fair is scheduled from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. today at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Collegian regrets the errors.

Soldiers stand in formation during a departure ceremony in Hangar 817 at Marshall Army Air Field at Fort Riley on Monday morning. The 774th Ordnance Company, Explosive Ordnance Disposal, were deployed to Bosnia-Herzegovina to support Operation Joint Forge.

Soldiers receive farewell at ceremony

BY MIKE WATSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Twenty Fort Riley soldiers were deployed to Bosnia-Herzegovina Monday morning after a ceremony at Marshall Army Air Field.

The soldiers will rendezvous with the 1st Cavalry Division of Fort Hood, Texas, for assigned elements supporting an operation dubbed "Joint Forge" The unit, the 774th Ordnance Company, Explosive Ordnance Disposal, is relieving the 1st Armored Division, which is overseas now.

"The unit's task is to provide routine and explosive ordnance disposal support, provide support to battalion-level task forces or brigades and provide protection as required for VIPs," Major General Freddy McFarren said.

Staff Sergeant Byron Scott Rider said he knew for several months that he would be leaving, but that didn't help with the farewell.

"It's going to be tough, but we're going to be able to do it," Rider said.

Rider said he will miss many special occasions with his three children, Harley, Austin and Wyatt, and his wife, Shannon.

"I guess we'll all just miss him, especially the kids," Shannon Rider said.

"He'll be gone for all the birthdays and holidays."

McFarren praised the ceremony and shared his experience from his first deployment.

"The first time I was deployed, it was in the middle of the night, and I returned at night," McFarren said. "I express my gratitude for the ceremony to give the battalion a proper farewell."

For troops, separation from their families is hard enough, but the ceremony is a pleasant change from being sent out with no prior notice and no farewells, Specialist Erick Ritterby said.

"I think it's a good thing that the Army does a ceremony like that," Ritterby said.

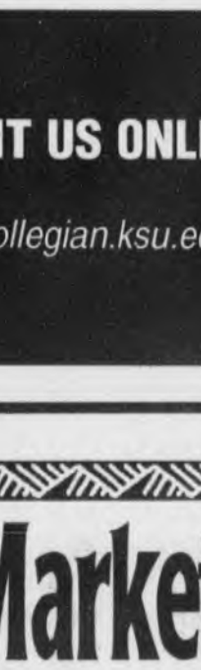
"Like what the general said, sometimes troops disappeared at night and no one knew where they went. It's changed a lot since Vietnam.

"I think it's a good thing."

Throughout the next six months, the outfit's skills will be tested, McFarren said. However, he said the Fort Riley soldiers know they're prepared and will serve their country well.

Interim dean pursues permanent position

BY JEFF SUTTON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN



Editor's Note: This story is the seventh installment of the Collegian's "Meet Your Dean" series.

If one word could describe R.W. Trewyn's life, it would be change.

K-State's interim vice provost for research and dean of the graduate school said he originally planned to study business, become an accountant and work in sales management for the rest of his life.

Things changed.

"I had gone to work for a corporation in Milwaukee, Wisconsin after I graduated from business school, then a couple of things happened," Trewyn said. "I decided that accounting was a lot more fun when I was going to school than doing it every day."

TREWYN

Later, as an undergraduate at the University of Wisconsin-Whitewater, Trewyn made the switch out of business.

"When I got back to school, I had a really great botany course my first semester and a horrible business course, and eventually things started to evolve," Trewyn said. "All of a sudden, I was a biology major instead of a business major."

Then Trewyn received a call from Uncle Sam.

After 19 months of active duty in Vietnam, Trewyn was injured and came home to finish his biology and chemistry degree in Wisconsin. He earned his Ph.D. in microbial physiology at Oregon State University and later did post-doctoral research at the Denver Medical School. He eventually settled down at Ohio State University as a faculty member.

"I was there for 16 years, doing cancer research and teaching in the medical school," Trewyn said.

Trewyn then made one more university change and came to K-State four years ago as the associate vice provost for research. He took over as president of the KSU Research Foundation.

Trewyn assumed the position of interim vice provost for research studies and interim dean of the graduate school in June.

The two positions were combined when Trewyn's predecessor, Tim Donahue, began in 1990. Last spring, a task force decided to continue to keep the two positions together. Now a search has begun to fill the permanent position, and Trewyn said he would like to continue to have both of these positions.

"If you look at the bigger picture, there's a tight correlation between research and graduate education," Trewyn said, "so you don't ever unlink the two."

Meanwhile, Trewyn is looking for ways to enhance the graduate school experience without adding to the length of time a student has to spend in school.

"We're looking at the potential of, instead of going to majors and minors, building in certificate programs into the mix," he said.

Most of all, Trewyn said he is trying to make necessary changes to improve K-State.

"We're looking at the issues of interdisciplinary graduate programs and trying to see if there are ways where we can carve specific niches where Kansas State University really can come to the floor as a noted force in particular areas," Trewyn said.

Public sees Clinton's true character on tape

Clinton needs to resign.

Last week's release of the Starr report left doubt in the collective mind of the editorial board that Clinton's fate was so certain. Now that we have had the privilege of seeing our president come under fire point-blank, now that we have seen him weasel around questions presented to him, now that we have seen him redefine words for his convenience, now that we have seen him squirm and grow red in the face when confronted by his own contradictions, it seems only appropriate to put him and the rest of the country out of this misery.

All of it was given to us on national television, with analysts pointing and commenting on Clinton's body language. The office of the presidency was brought to the level of a spectator sport.

Early last week, this was a bipartisan issue, but it wasn't long before the mud-slinging started. Republicans felt the need to respond to an offensive maneuver against Henry Hyde, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. The White House was rumored to have revealed the evidence that Hyde had been involved in an affair with a married woman in the late 1960's, an affair Hyde described as "youthful indiscretion." Republicans were irate, citing the move as intimidation by the White House — and, despite the fact that White House involvement was unconfirmed — quickly mailed off a letter to F.B.I. Director Louis Freeh.

If the Starr report had come out after Nov. 4, the issue probably would have remained bipartisan, but now, each side is trying to turn the advantage away from the other. Democrats are confused about how to try to save face in the coming election. The president's approval ratings have managed to endure the storm with minimal hits so far. If Clinton's ratings remain high, Democrats should do well in the coming election. If his ratings plummet, the best policy for Democratic candidates is to abandon ship. Unfortunately, once candidates speak out against Clinton, there is little opportunity to go back on their words. Democrats are stuck between a rock and a hard place.

As a result, there is no indication that the mudslinging will end shortly. Both parties are trying to urge moderation on this issue, but it remains uncertain whether their efforts will be successful. As long as the Lewinsky affair remains partisan, Democrats and Republicans will continue to grapple without hope of resolution. Government will remain impotent until Clinton leaves office in two years.

That's why he needs to resign now. It is the best for the country.

Ultimately, Clinton is the only one responsible for his actions. Whether the video tapes should have been released or the Starr report should have been drafted is irrelevant. Ultimately, the only way the country could have been spared this embarrassment is if Clinton had been truthful about his relationship originally. If he had been honest in January, the situation never would have spiraled out of control.

Now, however, Pandora's Box has been opened.

The president is lacking in character. He could not come out and say he had made a mistake several months ago, and as a result, this scandal has become a global affair. It is embarrassing for the people of the United States. Clinton is of little use as a leader as long as the people remain divided. When other countries fail to respect him, he makes a poor representative of our interests abroad. His legal maneuvering has made a mockery of the court system as he struggles to find alternative definitions for words a two-year-old understands, and half of his staff feel they can no longer trust him. The presidency has been weakened, and there is no indication that Congress can take up the slack.

It was uncomfortable to watch Clinton's testimony, to see him slither around issues for four hours. It was offensive at times, as though he was insulting the intelligence of prosecutors and the American public.

Granted, smugness is not reason for impeachment. But it is icing on the cake. Whether you are interested in Clinton resigning or not, you need to notify your representative. The editorial board is firm in the belief that the public should call for Clinton's resignation, but regardless of our opinion, you need to provide your representative with guidance. It's the only way this situation will see a resolution.

Democracy accords a well-informed public that right.

DREAM A LITTLE DREAM

Men as sex objects, women as thinkers outlandish on real-life covers

VIEWPOINT

MARY E. VANLEEUWEN

Last night, I had a fantastically wonderful dream.

With visions of "Rolling Stone" covers dancing in my head, I dreamt that all the world turned topsy-turvy-like and society did a 180-degree turn without even realizing the significance.

I dreamt that all the past year's "Rolling Stone" covers were a bit different than from when I remember seeing them originally published in the real world. To begin, my dream had a touch of the supernatural. The covers were free-flying around my room like the ghosts of revolutionary people long forgotten or like butterflies on a mission.

If you've kept up with Stoney-boy in the past year, many of the cover photos I'll describe in a minute might sound familiar, with their leather and ties and bare chests (Oh my!), leather and ties and bare chests (Oh my!), leather and ties and bare chests (Oh my!). Every dream should relate in some way to "The Wizard of Oz."

OK, after that tangent, I hope you're riveted.

I was flying around — like I always do in my dreams — and, in taking a closer inspection, I realized what was so backwards about the covers. It seemed that men and women featured on the covers switched places. In reality, Mariah Carey was featured wearing nothing but a cowboy hat, but in my dream, Richard Ashcroft was featured wearing nothing but a cowboy hat, while Mariah took Richard's place with a serious-faced headshot.

Whereas "Rolling Stone" in reality photographed Jack Nicholson in a suit, tie and shades, my dream slapped him on the front cover in a leather, lace-up, lingerie piece-of-sorts, equipped with fishnet stockings and high black boots. Sarah Michelle Gellar, who donned this outfit in the real world, was now wearing on her cover a powersuit and a pair of glasses.

So was the diagnosis, over and over. Johnny Depp wears a tube top and is submerged in water, while Fiona Apple gets the serious-faced headshot. The Beastie Boys crouch naked, bodies arched, on a bed of pink-rose petals, while Laetitia Casta is photographed in unflattering eighties basketball gear. Shania Twain wears the suit, and Jerry Springer wears the leather vest and holds the sheer scarf over his genitalia.

Crazy, crazy stuff got even more psychotic when they started talking.

Carey is talking about her dedication to her work. Ashcroft is wondering if "Rolling Stone" is going to show his nipples. Nicholson is cursing himself for not losing that extra 10 pounds before the shoot. Gellar is talking about her new raise. Depp is feeling guilty for eating too much celery. Apple is just ready to get off the cover and on with her life. The Beastie Boys are wondering if they should have used more self-tanning lotion or more gel. Casta just wants to look retro. Twain openly talks of getting her own talk show. Springer is whispering about how he's contemplating an operation involving penile enlargement.

I float out my window onto my roof, and all the world is buzzing. Men are fretting over their hair, their bodies, their paleness and their cellulite. Women are judging the men's hair, bodies, paleness, cellulite and sexiness on a scale of one to ten. Women are resting safe in the fact that their bodies will not really be a factor in their success.

The dream seemed so real that I woke up and climbed out onto my roof, looking for the "Rolling Stone" butterflies and signs of change, or perhaps a compromise between my dream and reality.

We all know that the live butterflies can't be made out of paper (thank goodness). I guess the 180-degree turn that I saw in my dream was only a figment of my imagination as well.

VIEWPOINT

CHRIS PIATT

Khakis do not swing.

I am not sure how this rumor started, but a recent Gap commercial seems to be perpetuating the misconception. The advertisement features lots of young, attractive people swing dancing in khakis. Do not be deceived by this populist propaganda. Khakis do not, nor will they ever, swing.

The real swingers are all dead. Frank Sinatra, leader of the swinging Rat Pack, left us this past summer for that big martini bar in the sky. He was the last of the breed. The rest of them drank, smoked and gambled themselves into their graves long ago. It seems as if we ought to let sleeping rats lie.

Apparently not.

The secret committee that determines American pop culture has decided to dig into the vaults of time once again. This go around, they have managed to unearth cocktail culture. The essence of this movement lies in the music. As a result, a number of swing bands have found themselves unwittingly thrust into the mainstream. They range in quality from hot and original to laughingly uninspired imitations.

I am truly glad to see a revived interest in this musical genre. It places a genuine emphasis on musicianship. It does not rely on studio dubbing, and, in the absence of electric instrumentation, it can be successful only as a result of the musicians' sheer electricity and power. Also, after being exiled almost exclusively to jazz venues, the only place where they seem to be fairly utilized, brass players finally have another place to call home.

I was raised on Benny Goodman records. Glenn Miller was a staple in my home. My father is a devout Bob Wills fan, and my mom still thinks Sinatra was a dreamboat. I have countless aunts and uncles who lived on the big-band circuit until it died out in the mid 1950s. So, like Barbara Mandrell, who was country when country wasn't cool, I feel as though the music in my roots is being exploited just a bit.

I would be willing to make the sacrifice, though, if it were only the music being revived. However, people my age seem to be under the mistaken impression that they are actually swingers. This is an unfortunate illusion and unfair to the men and women who were the real thing.

Perhaps the trend can be attributed to the fact that after sponging off the 1970s for so long, we accidentally bled it dry. The search for identity has led us further back in time and landed us smack dab on the crazy, smoke-filled dance floors of the swing era, a period catch phrase that, like the Summer of Love, no one seems to be able to pinpoint.

The disappointing reality is that as a generation, we just aren't cool enough to pull this one off. Swing clothing, which seems to range from 1930's gangster apparel to 1950's bowling shirts, looks ridiculous on slackers who are clearly not hip enough to carry cigarette cases and swill from tall martini glasses.

There are no hep cats or Daddy-Os. There are only pimply wannabes whose attire is something akin to high school spirit week. This is merely another attempt to find identity for a generation who wants like hell not to be remembered for making the Spice Girls popular.

I hope the exposure swing music is getting helps listeners hone a genuine appreciation. This is great music, especially the originals. Artie Shaw does deserve a second listen.

However, Duke Ellington in your CD player, Vitalis in your hair and a Zippo lighter in your pocket does not a swinger make. With no Prohibition to get around, Nazis to fight or baby boom to contend with, we're just teenagers and twentysomethings who like brass sounds.

There is no need to emulate the cool but inevitably destructive swinger lifestyle. After all, even Frank Sinatra could attest to the fact that the trouble with the rat race is this: Even if you win it, you're still a rat.

Editor,

I've been an ardent supporter of Bill Clinton since his days as governor of my home state of Arkansas. I've voted for him, I've campaigned with him, and I've defended his character and politics to friends and enemies alike. Like many individuals, I've been greatly troubled by the information and allegations contained in Kenneth Starr's congressional report. The Sept. 14 editorial from the Collegian's editorial board, titled "Eye-glueing CNN coverage test of Clinton's character," only added to my concern.

The editorial board held up Kenneth Starr's report as a shining example of "democracy at its finest — the foremost example of what freedom of the press entitles us." I have to confess that I had to read the full paragraph twice to make sure the board wasn't being sarcastic. Sadly, it wasn't.

I, for one, certainly don't consider Starr's salacious, prosecutorial report of the president's extramarital foreplay with Monica Lewinsky to be the hallmark of our nation's first amendment right to a free press. I certainly don't think that freedom of the press entitles us to poke and prod, no pun intended, into the president's private, sexual activities.

Borrowing poorly from Plato, the editorial board said "the fact that Clinton's approval ratings are still so high indicates that his contemporaries still are allowing themselves to be deceived." Such a conclusion is insulting to those of us — more than 60 percent of the populace, if you believe polling data — who thoughtfully have considered the allegations being levied against the president and made the decision that we can support Clinton's policies and goals while personally disagreeing with his private behavior. Perhaps a better quote from Plato, and a possible motto for the editorial board, is that "Wise men talk because they have something to say; fools, because they have to say something."

The editorial board also said "A man who can lie to his wife and daughter in this manner could never be a good leader, despite any actions he is part of while in office." Life would be a lot simpler for us if the content of an individual's character was limited purely to the sum of his or her mistakes, but, fortunately for all of us, it isn't. Our nation's history is replete with examples of Americans whose personal lives did not affect their leadership abilities (e.g., Thomas Jefferson, John F. Kennedy, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Martin Luther King Jr., Dwight Eisenhower, etc.). Now you can add William Jefferson Clinton's name to the list.

Regardless of how this matter ultimately plays out, one conclusion should be obvious to lawmakers. The Supreme Court's decision that any sitting president, Republican or Democrat, can be sued in civil court while in office was bad jurisprudence. Had the Court's ruled otherwise, it's unlikely that we would have been subjected to the last seven months of Starr's salacious and highly political persecution.

'FloJo' dies from apparent heart seizure at age 38

BY KEN PETERS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MISSION VIEJO, Calif. — Florence Griffith Joyner, the triple gold medalist at the 1988 Olympics who captivated the world with her meteoric speed and flamboyant style, died Monday of an apparent heart seizure. She was 38.

From the White House to fellow track stars, the sprinter known as "FloJo" was mourned and remembered a decade after she turned the women's sprints at the Seoul Games into her personal showcase.

"We were dazzled by her speed, humbled by her talent, and captivated by her style," President Clinton said. "Though she rose to the pinnacle of the world of sports, she never forgot where she came from, devoting time and resources to helping children — especially those growing up in our most devastated neighborhoods — make the most of their own talents."

Griffith Joyner was the wife of 1984 Olympic triple-jump gold medalist Al Joyner and the sister-in-law of Jackie Joyner-Kersee, the six-time Olympic medalist and world heptathlon record-holder.

The Orange County sheriff's office said a 911 call was received early today from Al Joyner, who reported his wife was "unresponsive and not breathing."

"She had passed away during the night," spokesman Lt. Hector Rivera said.

An autopsy was scheduled.

Griffith Joyner had suffered a heart seizure two years ago on a flight to St. Louis.

Primo Nebiolo, the head of the IAAF, track's international federation, said he knew Griffith Joyner had some serious heart problems in recent months but that the news still was "a great shock ... which makes me extremely sad."

"I will never forget this extraordinary athlete who stunned the world in Seoul 10 years ago with her amazing sprints and spectacular outfits," Nebiolo said in Brussels.

"Sadly, her life has passed as rapidly as her races."

Griffith Joyner maintains world records in the 100- and 200-meter dashes.

She set the 100-meter mark of 10.49 seconds at the quarterfinals of the 1988 Olympic trials at Indianapolis; since then, no one has even broken 10.60. At Seoul, she won the gold medal in a wind-aided 10.54.

She then smashed the world 200-meter record in the Olympic final, clocking 21.34. Marion Jones, with a 21.62 at the World Cup in South Africa earlier this month, is the only other woman to run the 200 in less than 21.70.

Griffith Joyner also won a gold medal in the 400 relay and just missed a fourth gold medal when the U.S. team finished second in the 1,600 relay, which she anchored.

"What Florence brought to track was a flash and a flair that we didn't have, which was probably good for the sport and got attention for us," said Evelyn Ashford, the 1984 Olympic sprint champion who competed with Griffith Joyner throughout the 1980s.

Griffith Joyner also displayed a muscular physique, which prompted talk of steroid use. She said she never used performance enhancers, and she never failed a drug test.

In 1996, she suffered a seizure on an airplane flight from California to St. Louis. She was hospitalized for one day, and the family requested that no other details be released.

At the time, Griffith Joyner, accompanied by her husband and daughter, Mary, was en route to the Jackie Joyner-Kersee Relays for high school athletes.

"We lost one of the great track and field athletes in history," said Greg Foster, the three-time world champion in the 110-meter hurdles. "She's going to be missed. It's definitely a shock, a great loss."

Funeral arrangements were not immediately announced.

Phase one of K-State's road back to the NCAA Tournament is complete. For the most part, it went according to plan.

After a two-and-one weekend at the Bank of Fayetteville Classic, the Wildcat volleyball team finished the non-conference portion of the schedule at 6-3.

"The thing that helped the most was that we got better as the preseason went along," Wildcat assistant coach Jeff Grove said. "For the most part, we kept improving, and we are a better team right now."

The weekend didn't go exactly according to plan, but the Cats battled back after losing Thursday's tournament opener against the host team — Arkansas.

The Razorbacks beat the Cats in three straight games, 15-6, 18-16 and 15-7.

"They're one of the best, if not the best, blocking team in the country," Grove said. "They're extremely physical. They have a lot of veteran leadership on their team."

The main thing that hurt the Wildcats was their lack of consistency.

"We had some letdowns that shouldn't have happened," senior Kim Zschau said. "We could've played better."

The middle blocker recorded five block assists in the match to become K-State's all-time leader in that category, with 433.

Disney Bronnenberg distributed 53 assists for the Cats, which was the fourth-highest total in K-State history for a three-game match.

K-State bounced back Friday to hammer Miami of Ohio in three straight, 15-7, 15-8 and 15-10.

"I still don't think we played our best volleyball in that match," Grove said.

"But we were able to stop their biggest offensive players. We had a good strategy going in," he said.

In a classic match that lasted 2 hours and 45 minutes, the Cats knocked off the Illini in five games.

"We came ready to play," Grove said. "There was more of an attitude. We showed a lot of perseverance and toughness."

After dropping the first game 15-10, K-State battled back to get a 15-3 blowout in game two.

Games three, four and five went down to the wire. The Cats won the third game 15-13 and came within one point of taking the match in game four.

"We had them down 14-9 and should have put them away," Grove said. "But we let them back into it."

The Illini scored nine of the next 11 points to gain an 18-16 victory and stay alive in the match.

However, K-State did put it away in game five with a 16-14 win.

"It was just a great feeling coming into the game," Zschau said. "We came in really strong and played really well throughout the whole match."

Bronnenberg recorded 106 assists — good for the fourth-highest total in NCAA history in a five-game match.

Phase two of K-State's road back to the NCAA Tournament begins this Friday as the Cats are host to Oklahoma in the Big 12 opener.

The match begins at 7 p.m. and can be heard on KSDB-FM 91.9.

Freshman honored

K-State setter Disney Bronnenberg became the first freshman in the history of the Big 12 Conference to win the league's Player of the Week award after the Bank of Fayetteville Classic at the University of Arkansas.

Bronnenberg helped fuel K-State to a 3-1 record last week, culminating in an upset of 22nd-ranked Illinois at the Classic. In that 3-2 victory, she broke the K-State and Big 12 records for assists in a five-game match with 106, fourth-best in NCAA history and just three shy of the NCAA record held by former Nebraska All-American Lori Endacott, who dished out 109 against Texas on Nov. 5, 1988.

In three other matches last week, Bronnenberg cracked K-State's top 10 in assists in a three-game match three times, including 58 in a 3-0 win over Wichita State on Sept. 15 and 53 in an 0-3 loss to No. 16 Arkansas. During her fourth-match run, Bronnenberg averaged 18.79 assists per game en route to being named to the Bank of Fayetteville all-Classic squad.

Respect.

That's the word we'll remember as K-State continues its march through a blurred, dream-like season that's supposed to be what national title hopes are made. That's the word repeatedly echoed during an early season that already has claimed so many: two out-classed teams, a herd of Longhorns, one former Heisman trophy candidate.

And 116 Wildcats.

After three games, we've seen K-State rewrite its team-record book. We've filled KSU Stadium to witness reruns of college football's version of "Saving Private Ryan," where the Wildcats have swiftly and forcefully slaughtered their opponents in the first 30 minutes. (Miss David Allen's punt return for a touchdown? See it again this Saturday.) We've seen Coach Bill Snyder visit Indiana State's locker room following a 66-0 win to inject hope into a hapless habitat. We've seen possibly the greatest kicker in college history inadvertently sprinkle lemon juice in Northern Illinois' gash by sticking his leg in the record books with a 65-yard field goal.

Saturday, we saw Ricky Williams' Heisman hopes slip away like sweaty dreads when the nation's top defense held him to 43 yards rushing, the fourth-worst performance of his career.

Now, there's people I question. My short list includes Mike Tyson, Bill Clinton and the 70 sportswriters who voted in The Associated Press Top 25 college football poll.

While Tyson's fascination with ears and Clinton's with cigars seem startling, nothing compares to the illogical thinking that stared me blankly in the face Sunday afternoon when the voters named K-State

Snyder doesn't care. He knows he has no control over the vote, the skyscraper expectations, the criticisms drawn when his dream team outscores its opponents 187-14 after three games. (Note to Snyder: Fall behind early in game, gain sympathy from voters.)

NCAA's official trampoline.

It's quite simple, really: there is no logic.

UCLA leaped K-State a week ago with its 49-31 victory against Texas. OK. When K-State beat Texas 48-7 Saturday and UCLA defeated Houston, 42-24 after falling behind in the first quarter, it was K-State's turn to jump. K-State earned two first-place votes. UCLA had one.

UCLA moved into No. 3 this week.

Tennessee, voted No. 6 last week, stunned then No. 2 Florida, 20-17 in overtime Saturday. A huge win for the Volunteers, who moved to No. 4.

Tennessee shouldn't be ahead of K-State, which should be ranked No. 3. Tennessee should instead be ranked ahead of UCLA, which should be No. 4.

K-State remains No. 5.

I'm still searching for the logic.

Here's what Snyder knows about the Top 5: "I think I know who they are. I probably couldn't put them in order, but that's not significant in our preparation. It's nothing I'm interested in right now."

Snyder doesn't care. He knows he has no control over the vote, the skyscraper expectations, the criticisms drawn when his dream team outscores its opponents 187-14 after three games. (Note to Snyder: Fall behind early in game, gain sympathy from voters.)

The tone for K-State's season became apparent long before August when the first question — "Can K-State beat Nebraska this year?" — was asked before hungry Big 12 sportswriters. It happened when the Wildcats, confirmed perfectionists, returned from Tempe, Ariz., in January and decided one loss was one too many for 1998.

Before the season began, Sports Illustrated awarded K-State with its "all-creampuff" schedule. Instead of praising Gramatica's historic kick, a nation of critics insisted Snyder ran-up the score. Texas is washed up. Northeast Louisiana is a

Cal Ripken goes back to work for Orioles

■ Day after third-baseman break streak, he passes Ruth on all-time hit list.

By David Crary
The Associated Press

TORONTO — It was a short furlough for Cal Ripken.

A day after ending his astonishing streak of 2,632 consecutive games, Ripken was back in the starting lineup for Baltimore on Monday against Toronto, the same team he faced when the streak started on May 30, 1982.

The SkyDome crowd rose to its feet when Ripken trotted to third base in the bottom of the first inning, and he responded to the ovation with a wave of his cap.

Then in his first at-bat, he singled off Roger Clemens in the second inning. It was Ripken's 2,874th hit, moving him ahead of Babe Ruth into sole possession of 34th spot on the career list.

With time to contemplate his decision, Ripken was sure he made the right move in ending the streak Sunday night.

"No regrets, no second thoughts," he said Monday during a pregame news conference. "I felt great about how it went. It was a great celebration instead of a sad event."

He admitted feeling strange about watching a game from the dugout and sounded relieved to be returning to the field.

"I still consider myself an everyday player," he said. "I have a lot of baseball left in me."

Ripken closed his record run by removing himself from the starting lineup in the Orioles' final home game of the season against the New York Yankees.

The move came more than three years after he broke 2,130-game streak of Yankees iron man Lou Gehrig — a record that had stood for 56 years.

Baltimore manager Ray Miller said he and Ripken had spoken a couple of times over the past month about the idea of taking days off.

"I told him this a couple weeks ago ... that 10 or 12 games off, or maybe 15 games, you would be 10 percent better," Miller recounted Monday. "I just think that common sense tells me you would be fresher."

But Miller said he planned to start Ripken for the rest of this season, and he marveled at what his third baseman had accomplished.

"The streak is mind-boggling," Miller said.

"He's 501 games past an insurmountable number. No one will ever make 2,131."

Ripken isn't so sure.

"If I did it, someone else can do it. I don't see myself as superhuman," he said in Baltimore after watching an Orioles' game from the dugout for the first time since May 29, 1982.

There's no telling how long Ripken could have gone. Gehrig's streak ended when he could no longer cope with a rare muscular disorder that later became known as Lou Gehrig's disease.

Ripken was completely healthy. He just got tired of the controversy surrounding the streak — more than one columnist called him selfish — and decided that spring training in 1999 might be more fun if he didn't have to talk about playing another full season.

So, without tipping off any of his teammates except Brady Anderson, his best friend on the Orioles, Ripken walked into Miller's office a half-hour before the game and asked to have his name removed from the starting lineup.

For Ripken, sitting out that one game proved to be the most difficult thing he had done since breaking into the league in 1981.

For one thing, he had no idea what to do to keep himself occupied.

"He goes, 'What are you doing?' And I said, 'I'm going to sit here and watch a ballgame,'" Ripken said. "I said, 'You want me to come out there and visit with you?'"

Ripken did just that. He talked with the fans and posed for pictures between innings, but afterward he made it clear that most of his days next season will be spent playing third base — from the first inning through the ninth.

"nobody." One critic predicted, weeks early, that on Oct. 10 in Boulder, K-State's national-championship dreams "might die a quick death."

Still, it became evident Sunday that no matter who K-State beats and no matter the score, the No. 5 Wildcats might lose weekly in the eyes of the Associated Press Top 25 voters unless David finally beats Goliath on Nov. 14. (See: K-State vs. Iowa State, 1997).

We all know coaches and sportswriters rarely agree on certain issues. Last year, it was the winner of the national-championship title. This week, it was K-State. The USA Today Coaches Top 25 poll ranked K-State No. 3. UCLA was No. 5.

Supposedly, this year's alliance bowl system will solve the national championship issue for good, on the field, No. 1 vs. No. 2, the way fans, sportswriters and many coaches have wanted it for years.

The system isn't perfect. It won't be perfect. With the chance of several teams ending their regular seasons undefeated, nothing is sacred or promised in the bowl alliance. As the Wildcats are quickly learning, nothing is guaranteed this season, either. Nothing. Not even when you win by 41 points.

Nov. 14 is circled in red ink.

Big 12 awards

DALLAS — Texas Tech running back Ricky Williams and linebacker Jeff Kelly and return man David Allen, both of K-State, are the Big 12 players of the week.

Williams, the offensive player of the week, carried 42 times for 244 yards rushing and two touchdowns as Tech beat Fresno State on Saturday, 34-28. Williams moved into the national rushing lead with an average of 221.7 yards per game.

Allen, the specialty player of the week, set Big 12 and K-State records by returning four punts for 172 yards, including a 93-yarder for a touchdown against Texas. K-State beat the Longhorns 48-7. Allen's 93-yard return is the second longest in school history.

Kelly, the defensive player of the week, led the Wildcat defense with 11 tackles, including two for a loss, with two forced fumbles and an interception returned for a touchdown.

U.S. carrying load in anti-terrorism fight, Clinton says

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — Keeping his public focus on international events, President Clinton renewed a global call to arms against terrorism Monday and attacked the idea that it is mainly an American problem of American making.

"This is a threat to all humankind," Clinton said in a 21-minute speech to the opening of the 53rd session of the United Nations General Assembly. The hundreds of delegates gave Clinton a rare standing ovation as he was introduced in the cavernous hall at U.N. headquarters.

White House aides were quick to tell reporters that Clinton was moved by the warm greeting, which offered a measure of support for a beleaguered president whose videotaped grand-jury testimony in the Monica Lewinsky matter was playing on television even as he spoke.

"It reflects the love and respect that the international community feels for you," Clinton's national security adviser, Sandy Berger, quoted Pakistani Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif as telling the president afterward.

Stressing that the United States is carrying its load in the anti-terrorism battle, Clinton said he would submit a request to Congress this week for emergency funding to repair damage to the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania that were bombed last month and to beef up embassy security worldwide. Aides later said he would ask Congress for $1.8 billion.

Clinton also had a one-on-one meeting at the U.S. mission to the United Nations with Sharif. His Pakistani government and neighboring India are locked in a nuclear-arms competition, and there is tension over the territory of Kashmir. Clinton has sought for months to halt the former and ease the latter.

Berger later told reporters that Sharif indicated he would make a positive statement on the subject of nuclear testing during his address to the U.N. General Assembly on Wednesday. Berger was not more specific, except to say the statement would be about the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, which Clinton wants both India and Pakistan to sign as a way of reducing tensions.

Clinton is due shortly to decide whether to scrap his plan to make stops in India and Pakistan this fall during an Asian trip that was scheduled before the two countries shocked the world by detonating nuclear test devices in May in defiance of American warnings.

Transportation secretary asks for $50 million to repair tracks

■ Miles of Kansas railways need repair within 10 years.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Lawmakers were told Monday it could take at least $50 million to bring the 2,700 miles of short-line railways in the state to a point where trains could be operated on them safely and efficiently.

Transportation Secretary Dean Carlson gave the estimate to the Special Committee on Rail Transportation during a Statehouse meeting. He also said, without repairs and continued maintenance, about 2,000 miles of track wouldn't be usable within a decade.

Carlson said the short lines, used mainly to haul agricultural products, would need between $50 million and $100 million over the next 10 years to be properly repaired.

"It's expensive to upgrade lines to where they should be. It will be very expensive," Carlson told the committee, which is expected to make recommendations to the 1999 Legislature.

Carlson said Gov. Bill Graves' Transportation 2000 task force, which is due to make a report later this year, probably will make recommendations on short-line railroads. He said the state had a $3 million revolving-loan fund that could be used for short lines but more is needed.

He said it "appears to be the case" that state and private-sector money will be needed, because there won't be enough federal funds to take care of all the needs.

"We need some sort of state program to help rehabilitate the tracks, which would be a good thing for Kansas," Carlson said.

He said most short-line railroads operate at speeds of 10 mph because of track conditions, but they need to move freight at 25 mph.

Also appearing before the committee was Michael Ogborn, managing director of Omni-TRAX, Inc., parent company of the Central Kansas Railway and Kansas Southwestern Railway.

The two railways, among 17 short-line operations in the state, together operate on some 900 miles of track in Kansas.

"We have no intention of leaving Kansas, but we can't operate without making a profit," Ogborn said.

Ogborn said the Legislature should grant short-line railways an exemption on sales and use taxes on equipment used for rehabilitating the rail lines. He said the biggest upkeep problem is the basalt or rock used for the track beds and the rail ties.

He also urged lawmakers to consider tax incentives for short lines and grain elevators to build rapid-load facilities, and said lawmakers need to urge the Kansas congressional delegation to push for more money for federal loan and grant programs.

Such money could be used for repairing or replacing railroad bridges, rails and crossings, he said.

Democrats propose new farm bill; $7.1 billion plan drops provisions

■ Democrat's former bill asked for meat labeling, price checking.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Top Democrats outlined the Clinton administration's $7.1 billion plan for helping America's farmers Monday, including money to lift marketing-loan rates, provide millions in disaster aid, uninsured crop relief and livestock assistance.

The plan still faces an uphill battle, though. Republican leaders are pushing their own $3.9 billion plan that was introduced last week and say they will include it in the agriculture spending bill awaiting congressional approval.

Also, the administration's plan still includes a one-year boost in rates on government-commodity loans that would trigger an estimated $5 billion in farm subsidies.

Republicans, in rejecting Senate Democrats' similar proposal last week, complained the provision was a throwback to the days before the 1996 farm law when farm subsidies were tied to crop production.

"Clearly, this is going to require Republicans and Democrats sitting together to resolve our differences," Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., said at a news conference with Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., and Deputy Agriculture Secretary Rich Rominger. "I would hope we could figure out a way."

The plan unveiled Monday drops the controversial provisions calling for meat labeling and mandatory price reporting, which were part of a plan Senate Democrats unsuccessfully pushed last week.

Instead, Monday's package keeps the $5 billion provision to lift marketing loans.

It also includes $935 million in multiyear disaster help; $460 million to help with this year's losses; $50 million in help for non-insurable crops; $100 million for quality losses to uninsured crops; $50 million for inundated land compensation and $85 million in emergency livestock assistance.

The plan also includes $362 million in operating loans; $40 million in staff support for the Farm Service's county offices and $10 million in assistance for the Forest Service.

"Our farmers have faced a triple whammy of bad prices, bad policy and bad weather," Conrad said.

"This package will go a long way to helping farmers with those conditions."

The Senate in July approved $500 million in assistance for farmers.

Senate Democrats had pushed a plan that included lifting the loan cap. They also proposed giving farmers another $500 million to cover their costs for storing grain while they wait for prices to rise.

To compensate for low commodity prices, the Republican plan includes $1.6 billion for a 29-percent increase in the annual payments farmers get each year.

Pawn shops offer quick loans; valuables used as collateral

BY GABE ECKERT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pawn shops can be a way for people who run low on cash to make it through the end of the month.

"'Pawn' is a word that means customers can bring in their property and use it for collateral to get a loan," said Bruce Michal, owner of the Manhattan Pawn Shop.

Michal, who has owned the shop since inheriting it from his father in 1979, said pawn shops provide two ways for people to get cash. In addition to providing loans, pawn shops also purchase property from customers for resale.

Most people who come to a pawn shop needing cash seek a loan, Michal said.

"We base the amount of the loan on the item's resale value," he said. "For example, if an item, brand new, sells for $200, it will probably have a resale value of $100. We use pricing books and magazines to determine the exact price."

Pawn shops are in every state in the country, but are regulated by state law, Michal said.

"The state regulates the interest rates and the time limit of the loans," he said.

Pawn shops in Kansas are required to have no more than a 10-percent interest rate, Michal said. The state also requires pawn shops to allow customers three months to pay off their loan and get their property back.

"An average loan for our shop is $60, and most people will return within thirty days to pay it off" Michael said. "Three quarters of the people who get a loan from our shop will return to get their merchandise."

Jorey Schooler, an employee at Cash Pawn and Gun, said pawn shops have an important role in the community.

"We give our customers an easy way to get money to pay bills instead of going to the bank," he said.

He said pawn shops also play an important role in giving small-dollar loans that banks and other lending institutions might not be willing to grant.

Schooler said people seek loans from pawn shops for a variety of reasons.

"A lot of people use our shop for loans to cover emergency expenses or to get through the end of the month," he said. "Really, there's no standard reason people come to our shop."

The shops also are working constantly to build a good reputation, Michal said.

"We are always trying to beat the established reputation of pawn shops," he said.

"A lot of the people we loan money to just don't know how to budget their finances correctly, and we're here trying to help them out."

Artist tries to capture blues, jazz music in artwork

BY KELLY LYNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

American artist Frederick Brown presented a lecture on his work Friday at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

During his lecture, he showed more than 150 slides of his oil paintings and watercolors, sharing his experiences and the intended meanings of many of his works.

"I think people really enjoyed it. He's a great storyteller," Katherine Schlageck, said education and public programs director.

Many of Brown's large-scale oil paintings captured the essence of blues and jazz music through portraits of late greats such as B. B. King, Buddy Guy and Muddy Waters, many of whom he knew or met while growing up in southern Chicago.

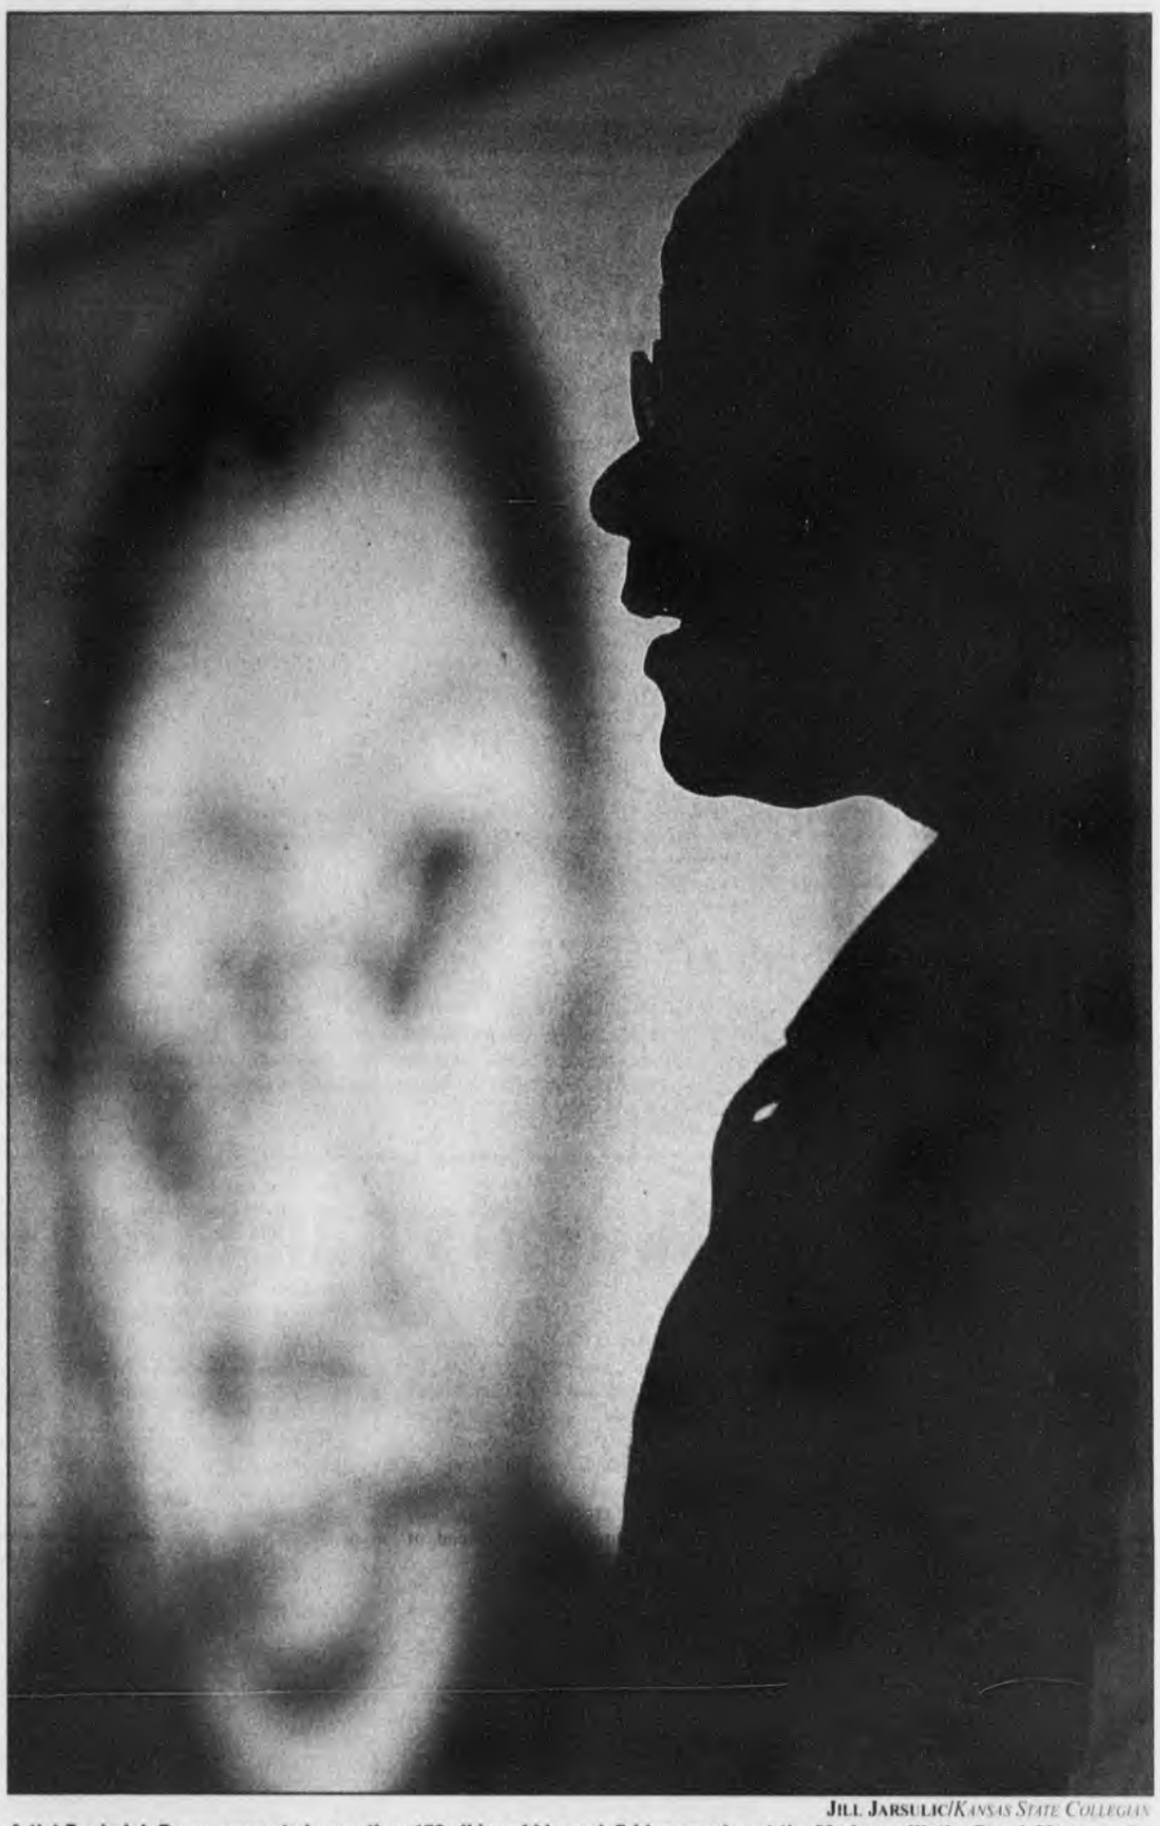
In his paintings, Brown said he tried to portray the person's image as well as the sound of the person.

"After doing the blues, it was just natural to go into jazz," Brown said.

In addition to blues and jazz artists, Brown has depicted a variety of American Indian and religious themes.

One of his most recognized works is "The Assumption of Mary," a 32 inch by 28 inch oil painting, weighing 6,500 pounds, on display at Xavier University in New Orleans.

Brown's artistic abilities extend beyond figurative painting.



"I've always gone back and forth between abstract and figurative painting," Brown said. "I've always liked to explore a broad range of painting, not just one particular area."

While oil is Brown's primary medium, he has created many watercolor pieces.

Brown incorporates his architectural background into watercolors with striking red, yellow and black shapes.

Brown, who has a bachelor of arts degree in art and psychology, graduated from Southern Illinois University in 1968 and has an extensive background in architecture.

Brown's paintings have been displayed at the National Museum of the Chinese Revolution in Beijing, China; the Marlborough Gallery and the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York; the Kemper Museum of Contemporary Art in Kansas City and the White House.

Anxious fiancé is hungry for sex; partner holds on to virginity

Dear Harlan,

Recently, my boyfriend has lost it. He's constantly asking me to have sex with him, but I am not ready. I don't know what to do anymore.

He says he still loves me, but he is tired of waiting. It has been almost 2 1/2 years, and, well every time the subject comes up, I get very uneasy. And not to mention we are engaged.

What should I do? Should I break off everything, or just tell him no, and if he doesn't like it, to leave?

Still Waiting

Dear Waiting,

It's like going to a restaurant and discovering there's a two-year wait. Your boyfriend is starving, and he's getting tired of waiting. When you're this hungry and you've been waiting so long, it's only natural to get a little impatient. It's no excuse, but he's very, very hungry.

The longer he continues to lose it, the less likely you're going to choose to lose it with him. He either has to ease up with the pressure or you're going to have to find a new fiancé.

You're going to need to let him know you appreciate his perspective, but his constant questioning is pushing you apart. If he's really this hungry, there are plenty of places to go for some fast-food loving.

It's so nice that you treasure your virginity!

— Harlan

Living together does not mean roommates are sleeping together

Dear Harlan,

I've been in an exclusive relationship for about nine months. I love my boyfriend, but there have been too many problems. The main one is sexual. My boyfriend and I only have it once a week.

Lately, I'm just not satisfied when we do it. It seems when he's finished, I'm just starting. Since we've started living together, our sex life has decreased when I thought it would only get better.

I know sex isn't everything in a relationship, but I'm so frustrated I just feel like crying. I feel so empty and lonely.

I don't want to cheat on him, because I love him with all of my heart. Besides, there are so many sexually transmitted diseases out there; I don't know what to do.

Any advice would be helpful.

— Sexually Frustrated

Dear Frustrated,

I'm frustrated that you're frustrated, and a lot of other readers are frustrated they can't help you take care of your sexual frustration. There's a lot of frustration happening here.

According to clinical psychologist Dr. Jonathon Michaelis, your feelings of loneliness and emptiness are also common signs of depression. Whether you're down only because of the sex issue is something you'll have to discover on your own.

Before attempting to find answers, your boyfriend needs to be made aware of the problem. As far as he knows, he thinks he's a dynamic lover who prides himself on quality, not quantity.

When you have your talk, don't do it in the bedroom. Instead, pick a happy and comfortable place to address the issue. Make sure the conversation is non-threatening and avoid making any accusations. Simply make him aware and ask for his help.

Be prepared, this whole thing might even bring you closer together, both physically and emotionally. The fun might follow in showing him and telling him how he can make you happy.

Between moving in and getting so serious, it's been a big month. The sex issue might be a symptom of something deeper. If you can't find the answers on your own, find them with the help of a professional.

If you can't find a therapist, try (800) THERAPIST and get a referral.

— Harlan

Feeling used when "doing it" might signal time for change

Dear Harlan,

Whenever I "do it" with my boyfriend of two months, I feel like I've been used. I really like him, and I don't want to break up.

Even though he says he loves me, I somehow get the feeling I'm being used. I haven't done it with anyone before him. We're both 16 years old.

Maybe it's just me being paranoid because it's my first sexual relationship.

— Possibly Used

Dear Used,

If you describe it as "doing it," you're too young to "do it."

There are many kinds of love, but the one that makes you feel used after being so intimate is one that shouldn't involve sex. You're not paranoid. You're just dealing with a massive overload of emotions that come along with something so intimate and personal.

If you're feeling used, stop doing whatever makes you feel used.

Don't be upset; just be aware that you don't need to "do it."

Unix system easy target for hackers

BY GABE ECKERT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Computing and Network Services is encouraging students and faculty to protect themselves from computer hackers.

"We are continually looking at computer security," said Beth Unger, vice provost for academic services and technology and dean of continuing education. "It is an increasingly important topic."

The Unix system, which is used for e-mail, is the computer system hackers are most likely to invade, Unger said. Other university computer systems are also possible targets of computer hacking.

"The Unix system is the most visible system to outsiders," said Harvard Townsend, interim director of Computing and Network Services. "But departmental servers, network servers and individual desktop machines have also been the brunt of attacks."

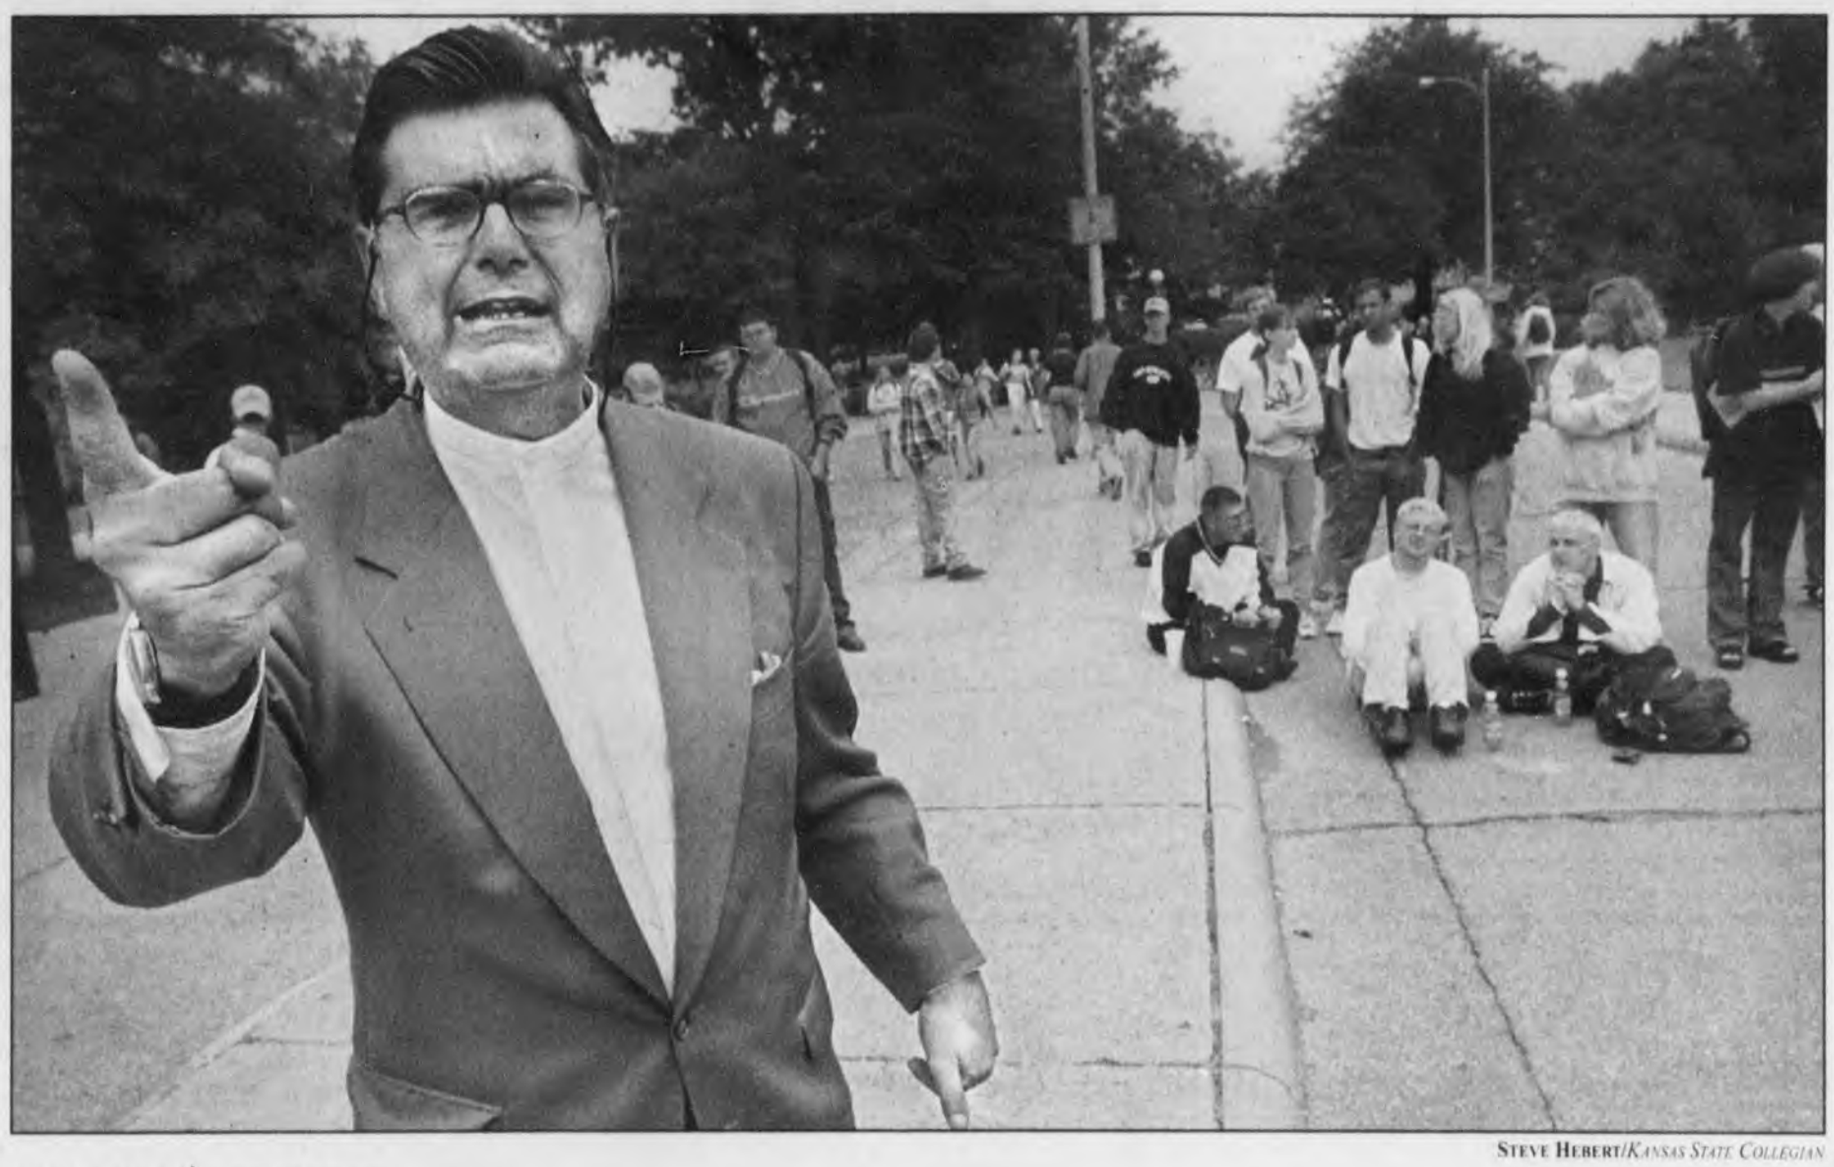
Townsend said the K-State Access Technology System, which contains students' grade point averages, course schedules, financial-aid records and other personal information, is on a secure system and is not likely to be tampered with by computer hackers.

"The KATS system is running on a computer system that is not open for general access," Townsend said. "KATS is in a tightly secured environment."

CNS is working to educate students and faculty on how to protect themselves from computer hackers, Townsend said.

"Our main goal is to help our users understand their vulnerabilities and how to manage their accounts to make them more secure," he said.

According to CNS, nearly 20 percent of campus Unix accounts are considered highly vulnerable to computer hackers. Highly vulnerable accounts are those with passwords that are easily cracked.



Unger offered advice for students to make their Unix passwords more secure.

"To make your password more secure, you can substitute numbers or symbols for letters and use capitalization," she said. "Longer passwords are also usually better."

She also said she encouraged students to change their password at least once a semester and that they should never reveal their password to anyone.

CNS is considering several changes to improve computer security, Townsend said. These include making it easier to change Unix passwords, continuing the use of firewalls and improving awareness of computer-security issues.

"We have been hit by computer attacks for a long time. We are constantly upgrading our system to ward off attacks," Townsend said. "The challenge is to try to keep one step ahead of the hackers."

PRACTICING FREE SPEECH

Traveling campus evangelist Jed Smock, of Newark, Ohio, preaches to a gathering of students Monday afternoon in the free-speech zone, north of the K-State Student Union. Smock, along with Curtis Schell, of Lincoln, Neb., was preaching on campus Monday afternoon and was planning a trip to the University of Kansas today to do more preaching. Schell said the purpose of their preaching to students was to reveal the character of God to them. Smock and Schell will return to the K-State campus on Friday.

Students can start investing now for experience

BY JESSE MCCURRY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students can learn how to invest by educating themselves and exercising caution, Jack Cooney, assistant professor of finance, said.

But many students don't know how to begin.

"I wouldn't even know where to start," said J.R. Broadhurst, sophomore in agricultural technology management. "It's not like I have that much money to throw around, anyway."

Cooney, adviser of the Finance Club, said college students first should look at their own financial troubles.

"Pay off some debt," he said. "Paying off your credit-card debt can mean 18 percent more money by getting rid of those high-interest payments."

Other options include certificates of deposit, mutual funds and stocks — each carrying different levels of risk and profit potential. Cooney said different investment opportunities have their own advantages and disadvantages.

Bank accounts are liquid but pay little interest. CDs pay between 2 and 6 percent but, depending on the term of the CD, must remain untouched for a period of time.

"The advantage at a bank is that risk is pretty much zero," Cooney said.

Investment decisions involve asking some important questions, he said.

"How much risk do you want to take? How much liquidity do you want?" Cooney asked.

Cooney said students should diversify their portfolio to limit risk.

"Put some money in the bank. Put some you can afford to potentially lose in the stock market — diversity," he said.

Having someone invest for you costs money, Cooney said. However, certain mutual funds can expand your opportunities for earnings without the high commission costs that many brokerage houses charge.

"You can get what's called a no-load mutual fund, which can minimize those charges," he said.

"If you put into a mutual fund, you're buying into all the stocks that a mutual fund owns."

The advantage is that costs are spread among all the mutual-fund shareholders, and there is usually only a management fee, Cooney said.

Another option is purchasing stocks. Joe Arata, assistant professor of agricultural economics and former Merrill Lynch executive, said it's never too early to begin.

"Young people will have to prepare for their own futures. Start saving and investing in stocks or equities. Compounding interest, if you start young, is a good thing, whenever you raise something to an nth degree. Exponents are good," he said.

A great way to invest is through your employer, Arata said.

"Look at the company you work for. Companies like to be employee owned and most offer stock options. You can start small. Just look for the companies with good growth potential," he said.

Some students are finding it difficult to begin investing while in college.

"As of right now, I don't have a lot of money laying around to play with," Paul Garcia, senior in industrial engineering, said.

Arata said it's not necessary to hire an expensive money manager to tell you what to invest if you educate yourself.

"Any K-State graduate who can analyze basic income statements and balance sheets can do as well as anyone else," he said.

"The best thing you can do, especially since you are younger, is read everything you can to educate yourself and then invest a little bit of money at a time," Arata said. "It's always a good time."

SILVER KEY

Shelter director Junell Norris said the Silver Key event helps educate the community about homelessness in Manhattan.

"We depend on the community for funding as well as raising awareness of the homeless problem in Manhattan," Norris said. "Groups such as Silver Key have helped to raise awareness of the shelter with students as well as with faculty."

Norris said the shelter is always in need of supplies such as toilet paper, soap, shampoo and paper towels. Students can make donations of these items in addition to their time year round.

"They can answer phones, supervise community service workers — we even have work-study positions open," Norris said.

Silver Key members said students should attend the sleepout; activities are planned throughout the day.

The K-State women's basketball team will be in the free-speech zone from 1 to 3 p.m. For $1, students can challenge them to a game of one-on-one or Pig.

At 6:30 p.m., students are welcome to walk to the shelter with the members to present them with a certificate.

Once the group returns, Manhattan Mayor Steve Hall will read a proclamation supporting the sleepout.

Bosco said Dillons, Food 4 Less, Subway, Mr. Goodcents, Domino's and Little Caesar's will be handing out coupons and food to those participating.

She urged those with an interest to stop by and participate.

"We encourage people to come out," Bosco said, "and stand against homelessness in support of the shelter and the services it provides."

RESPONSE

make that decision."

Fliter said he didn't think the president's actions were cause for impeachment but that if he had any personal integrity, he would resign.

Fliter said he thinks the release of the tape was an attempt by Republicans to embarrass the president.

"The video was released, number one to embarrass him and also to try to bring down his ratings with the public," Fliter said.

Clinton's approval ratings are still pretty high, he said, and added that Republicans want to get damaging information out so they feel more comfortable with the impeachment process, because it's easier to impeach a politically unpopular president.

Fliter said a lot of Democrats probably are disappointed and disillusioned.

"This could backfire on the Republicans in an number of ways," Fliter said.

He said the issue might bring more Democrats to the polls in November because they are upset about how Clinton has been treated. Although Clinton obviously lied, this might be viewed as a partisan effort to bring the president down, Fliter said.

"His credibility is hurt," he said.

"It will probably undermine his ability to get anything done in his second term even if he survives this whole process."

PAINTINGS

Don Lambert, vice president of the Kansas Arts Commission, said 10 to 12 rural communities will be chosen to be host to the exhibit.

"Before, people would have to drive long distances to see any art. This is bringing the art to the communities," Willis said.

The rural communities will receive something out of the traveling exhibit — a chance to see art by a Kansas artist who started as a wheat farmer.

Students, meanwhile, not only will receive the personal benefits of helping people but also will receive $6 per hour for their time spent on the project.

"It is a great opportunity to have a meaningful art experience, to learn more about Kansas and to come to understand the importance of the arts across the state," Lambert said.

Tirella said the great thing about this project is applying what is done in class to real-world experience.

"There is so much control and freedom in the project. So much directly ties into what they (the students) are doing in class," she said.

Another benefit to both the students and the community comes straight from the program name itself, community service.

"They are helping the community by doing good for others while benefiting themselves," Tirella said.

Lambert said he thinks Kansans will enjoy the new form of art.

"In rural Kansas, they will see art they don't see much. Here is art done by a rural Kansan who puts quite boldly some things they can identify with," Lambert said.

In the past, the K-State Community Service Teams have participated in international and statewide CSP Tutoring and America Reads Tutoring community service programs.

In 11 years, K-State students also have contributed more than 90,000 hours of service to area communities.

Senate defeats proposal to raise minimum wage

■ OUR OPINION
The Collegian editorial board says a gradual increase in the minimum wage needs to be instituted.

■ Increase would have raised wage to $6.15 by Jan. 1, 2000.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A proposal to raise the minimum wage by $1 per hour was defeated Tuesday in the Senate, and Democratic supporters vowed to campaign harder on the issue between now and the November elections.

The measure, defeated by a 55-44 vote, would have raised the minimum wage earned by some 12 million Americans to $6.15 by Jan. 1, 2000. The first 50-cent increase would have taken effect next New Year's Day.

Supporters said a minimum-wage increase was needed to help hard-working Americans struggling to get by. At a time of unparalleled prosperity, people who work in factories, restaurants, hotels, retail businesses and in other modest jobs actually have seen their purchasing power erode, they said.

Opponents said an increase would hurt small businesses and cause unemployment. It "could actually have an adverse impact upon our economy" and could cause unemployment "that hurts the low-income workers the hardest," Sen. Rod Grams, R-Minn., said before the vote.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., chief backer of the increase, said the vote showed that the Republicans were in the sway of business interests. He told reporters that for Democrats, the minimum-wage increase "will be a central issue in the course of this campaign."

President Clinton said in a statement that a boost in the minimum wage would have "helped ensure that parents who work hard and play by the rules do not have to raise their children in poverty."

Workers earning the minimum wage make an average $10,700 a year — $2,900 below the official poverty level for a family of three, supporters said. But Sen. James Jeffords, R-Vt., cited statistics showing more than half of minimum-wage workers live in families with annual incomes exceeding $25,000, and the majority of the workers are young, single and childless.

Democrats said that since the last federal wage increase took effect a year ago, new jobs have blossomed.

In his statement, Clinton said average wages for Americans have risen since then, and unemployment is at its lowest level in 28 years.

Democrats have bolstered their arguments with a study by the labor-backed Economic Policy Institute that found no discernible job losses among entry-level workers, including teen-agers, from the latest raise.

The study found that the increase boosted wages for nearly 10 million workers, of whom 71 percent were adults and 58 percent were women.

Kennedy had pushed to have his proposal adopted as an amendment to legislation in order to overhaul the personal-bankruptcy laws and make it harder for people to sweep away their debts.

In separate action on that measure, the Senate voted, 63-36, to kill a proposal by Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., to push credit-card companies to tighten their standards for extending credit to consumers.

Kennedy's strategy was similar to the one used by Democrats in 1996, another election year, when they held action on other legislation until Republicans agreed to vote to raise the federal minimum, then $4.25 an hour, to $5.15 by September 1997.

Underscoring the political potency of the issue, two Republicans seeking re-election, Sens. Alfonse D'Amato of New York and Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, voted with the Democrats to support the minimum-wage increase.

FAA funds to be used on airport

■ City commissioners call special session to meet FAA's Friday deadline.

BY SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission made a quick transition from air to water in a combination special legislative session and informational meeting Tuesday night.

Within the first 10 minutes of the meeting, commissioners Bruce Snead, Karen McCulloh, Ed Klimek and Mayor Steve Hall voted unanimously to approve Manhattan Regional Airport Director Ken Black's proposal for an amended contract for the Airport Master Plan update.

Under the new contract, which cut the total cost of the project from $113,000 to $106,000, the Federal Aviation Administration agreed to fund 90 percent of the update if the grant was accepted by Friday.

The unanimous vote amended the contract to meet FAA standards. Under the revised contract, the city will pay only $10,600 for the update program.

The project is expected to begin Oct. 6 and will continue until the same time next year, Black said. Once finished, the master plan will meet FAA specifications to apply for additional grants for future airport expansion.

Upon adjournment of the special session, the commission examined issues relating to stormwater-drainage problems in the Northview neighborhood.

Monty Prescott, principal engineer for the city's existing stormwater plan, illustrated incomplete areas of the plan. The original plan to improve drainage had included the neighborhood.

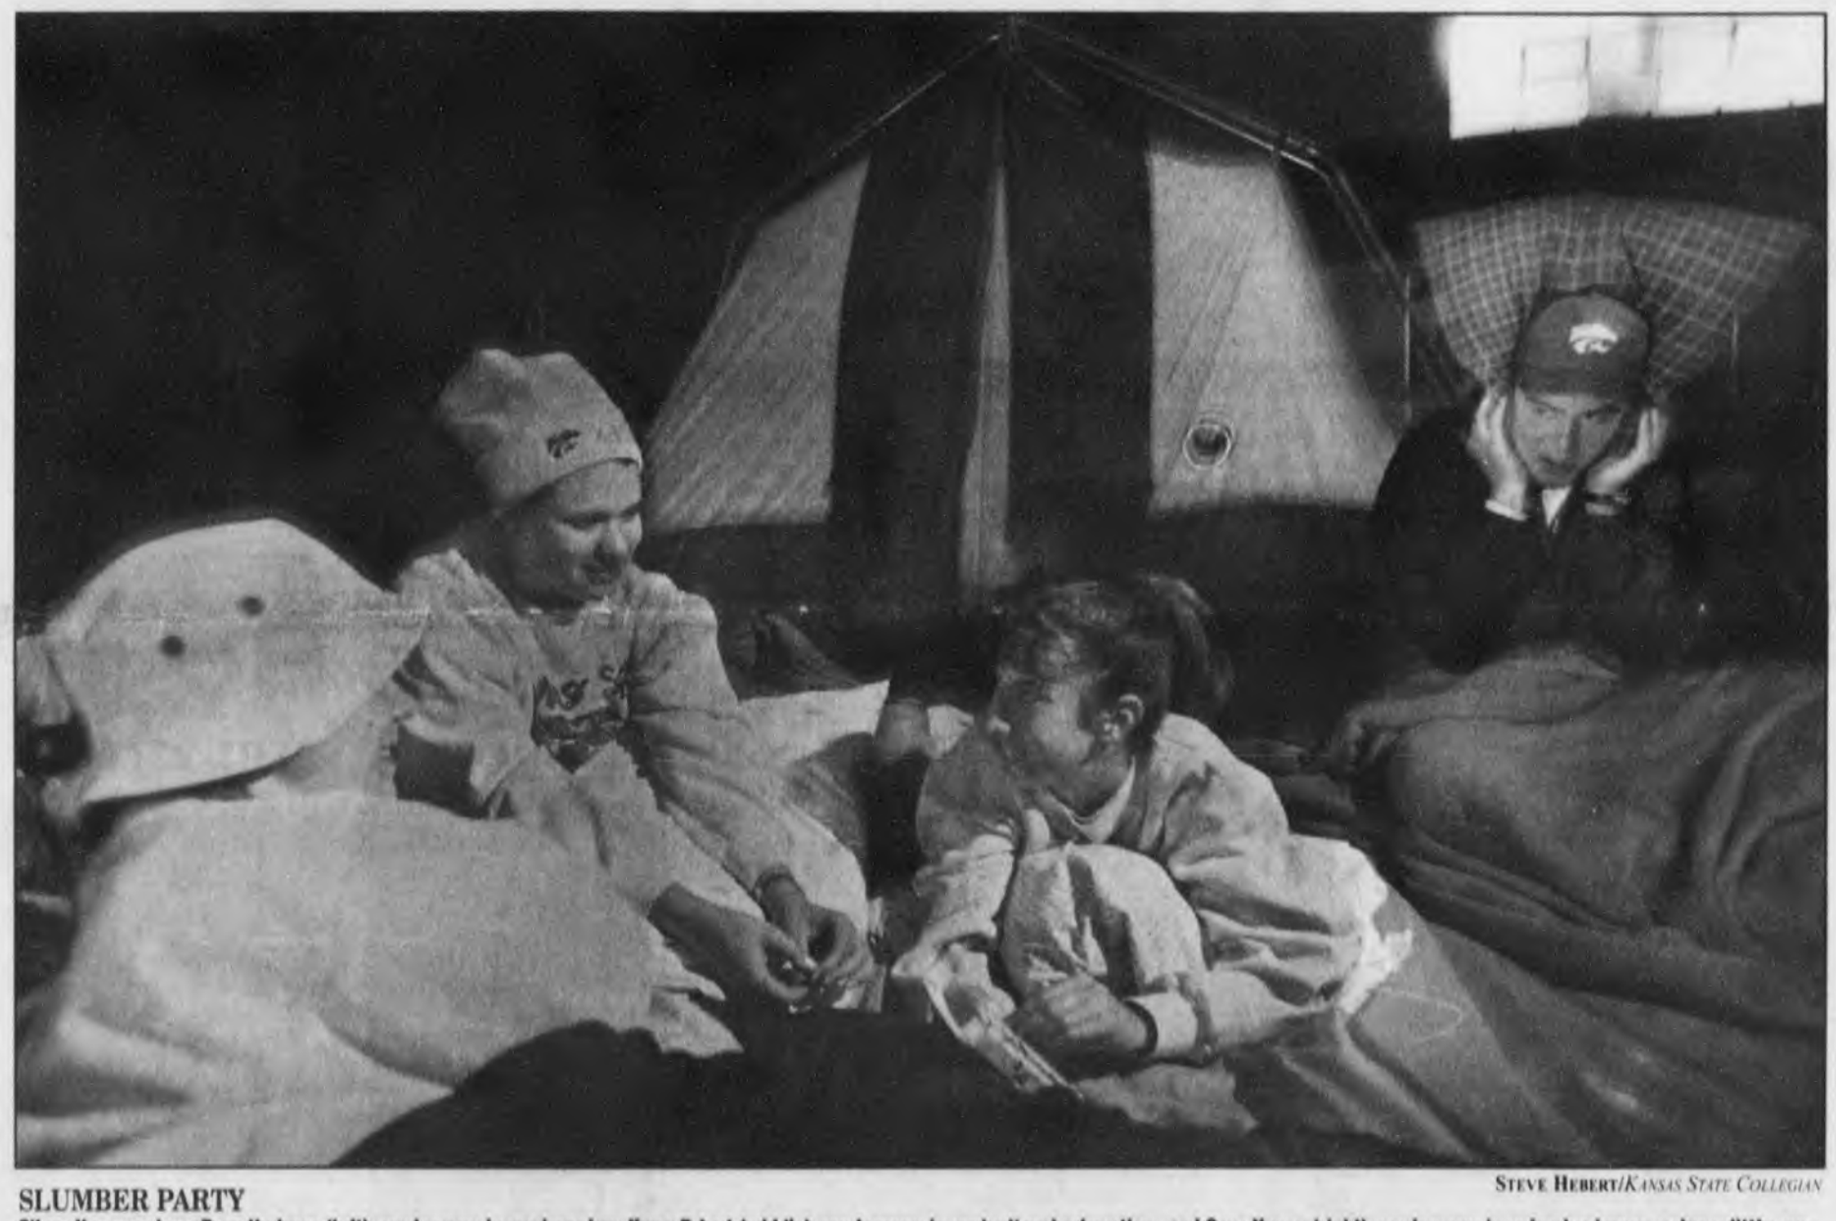
Specific improvement items not yet completed include replacing metal piping with concrete blocks in the Casement Road/Griffith Drive and Lincoln Drive systems, as well as widening the "Butterfield ditch" and adding a concrete base, Prescott said.

Residents of the area also expressed concerns about flooding that still occurs on the flat land of Northview.

Paul Hughes said he would like to see a more comprehensive study of the area instead of the generalized study from 1995. Six inches of rain usually doesn't matter in other areas, he said.

"It does when you're living essentially on a pool table. If we have plans to carry that concrete ditch all the way to Casement or a field, that's not really a plan," Hughes said.

The ditch needs to go all the way to the river, he said.



Ed Phelps, also a Northview resident, suggested the cooperation of the Kansas National Guard.

"If they could do this, it would mean tremendous savings for Northview," Phelps said.

Another point brought up frequently was limiting further development in the area.

"Until further developments can be made, you almost have to think of a zero-growth policy," Klimek said.

The meeting ended with Assistant City Manager Ron Fehr acknowledging the possibility of a specific Northview drainage study and Snead suggesting contact be made with the county government for mutual funding before alterations are made.

SLUMBER PARTY

BY JOE HURLA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hundreds of K-State students gathered at the KSU Career Fair in Bramlage Coliseum on Tuesday to meet with potential employers; many hoped to obtain internships, summer jobs or long-term employment.

"I graduate in May, and I'm here looking for a job," Lori West, senior in marketing, said. "No, I'm looking for a career, not a job."

Tim Henderson, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said the Career Fair was a good way for students to begin the search for employment.

"It's a good way to make initial contact with employers," Henderson said. "It's an excellent opportunity for students and alumni of K-State to come explore opportunities for summer internships and even careers."

Marcia Schuley, associate director of Career and Employment Services, said nearly 300 employers were present. Schuley said she had received good feedback from exhibitors.

"The comments I've received from employers are extremely positive," Schuley said. "They're delighted with the student traffic."

Danette Jackson, a representative from Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, said many students stopped at her booth.

Alex Limbal, a representative from Payless Shoe Source, said he thought the fair was successful because of the number of students circulating around the building.

Limbal said the success of the fair was important not only for students but also for employers. He said Payless hires a great deal of its employees from K-State, and the fair is a prime opportunity to make contact with them.

While many students said they were impressed by the variety of employers present, Tobi West, junior in life sciences, said she hadn't found what she was looking for.

"No one's here that I wanted to talk to," West said.

Though West had trouble finding the people she was looking for, Schuley said she considered the event a success.

"We are feeling very, very good about it," Schuley said. "We're so pleased with the way it turned out."

Schuley said part of the success was due to this year's venue. The event previously had been at the K-State Student Union, but it was moved to Bramlage this year.

Schuley also said student volunteers were a vital part of the fair. Without them, she said she never could have pulled the event off.

"Our student volunteers are the secret to our success," Schuley said.

Grant doesn't curb binge-drinking

Despite efforts of officials, Colorado students still drinking in excess

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOULDER, Colo. — Despite an $860,000 grant and full-time director to tone down binge drinking by University of Colorado students at Boulder, a new survey indicates they are drinking as much as they were five years ago.

"When you're talking about changing a culture, you don't see results overnight, but I see encouraging signs," said Robert Maust, full-time director of the grant given to CU by the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation. CU is in the third year of the five-year grant.

CU students were among 14,500 students at 116 colleges in 39 states surveyed last year in an alcohol study by the Harvard School of Public Health, a follow-up to a 1993 study. The results: Students are binge drinking at the same rate they were five years ago.

Fifty-eight percent of CU students said they drink in binges, defined as five or more drinks in a row, at least once every two weeks and about the same rate as in the 1993 study. Nationwide, 42 percent of the students admitted binge drinking in 1997, compared to 44 percent in 1993.

One third of the CU students surveyed admitted three or more binge-drinking sessions in a two-week period, compared to 26 percent in 1993. That compares nationally to about 20 percent in both surveys.

"A nice brochure or a speaker's forum to address years of previous conditioning is naive," Maust said. "The university community is inheriting a societal pattern."

The typical binge drinker, according to the Harvard study, was a binge drinker in high school, is male, white, 23 years old or younger, never married and living in a fraternity.

Despite the inherited drinking culture and the ominous statistics, Maust said he sees encouraging signs in the battle against booze at CU.

Meanwhile, a residence hall at CU's Kittredge housing complex devoted to "substance-free" housing debuted this fall — with a waiting list to get in.

"Fraternity and sorority members, and especially students who live in the houses, continue to be at the center of the campus alcohol culture," said Henry Wechsler, director of the Harvard study.

CU's 17 fraternities have banned alcohol at chapter-sponsored events on chapter property, a policy fully phased in this fall. It is unknown how well it will be enforced.

"The top-down leadership at the national organizations may have visions of going dry, but at the local level, I'm not sure they're rolling up their sleeves," Maust said.

CU's grant-funded program is trying a public health approach, focusing on secondhand victims — students who are victims of unwanted sexual advances, assaults, vandalism or sleep disruption by rowdy drunks.

Other efforts include an ad campaign developed by journalism students that takes on social issues such as sexually transmitted diseases, poor sexual performance and antisocial aspects resulting from drinking.

The ads appear on buses, movie theaters, a radio station and in some Boulder newspapers.

The school also is sponsoring booze-free social events such as swing-dance lessons, movie nights and concerts.

Gun discharges in bag of Topeka 5-year-old

TOPEKA — A 5-year-old boy brought a loaded 9 mm pistol to school Tuesday, and it discharged in a kindergarten classroom when he put his book bag away, a school official said.

Topeka Unified School District 501 spokesman Brad Stauffer said the gun went off inside the book bag when about 20 students were in the classroom, but nobody was injured. The school has 240 students in kindergarten through fifth grade.

The child, whom Stauffer declined to identify, was turned over to juvenile authorities for questioning after the incident at Quincy Elementary School, about one mile northeast of downtown.

Stauffer said authorities hadn't determined where the boy got the pistol, which he said had been reported to police as stolen in 1995.

Gasoline prices reach lowest level in 6 years

NEW YORK — The price of gasoline is at its lowest level in 6 1/2 years, according to a survey conducted for the American Automobile Association.

The AAA, which surveys gas prices around the nation each month, said the average price of a gallon of self-serve regular unleaded gas this month was $1.057, down 1.8 cents from August and 23.1 cents from a year ago.

This month's average is the lowest since March 1992, when a gallon of self-serve regular unleaded averaged $1.049.

Gasoline prices have fallen at the pump as supplies remained plentiful even during the summer-driving season. The drop in the retail price reflects a slide in wholesale gas and crude oil prices.

The average price of self-serve mid-grade gas this month was $1.145, down 2.1 cents from August and 22.6 cents from September 1997.

Self-serve premium averaged $1.208 this month, down 1.4 cents from August and 22.4 cents from a year ago.

The AAA said its survey showed regular unleaded gas was most expensive in the West at $1.211 a gallon and least expensive in the Southeast at 97.4 cents.

Other regional prices for regular unleaded: New England, $1.058; Mid-Atlantic states, $1.041; Great Lakes states, $1.02; Midwest, $1.016; and Southwest, $1.012.

Phone company offers service to filter out calls of telemarketers

CHICAGO — A Midwestern phone company is offering what it says is a first-of-its-kind service to help screen out those annoying sales calls that always seem to come during dinner.

"The message is loud and clear: Our customers simply want control over telemarketing," Diane Primo, president of product management for Ameritech Corp., said Tuesday, the first day the service was offered in parts of Chicago and Detroit.

It will be expanded to Ameritech customers throughout the Great Lakes region next year and also will be offered to other phone companies.

Here's how the Privacy Manager works:

First, a customer must have Caller ID. Then callers whose numbers register as "unavailable" or "unknown" are intercepted by a recorded message that asks the caller to identify himself or herself after a beep.

If the caller does so, the call then rings through. If the recipient picks up the phone, he or she hears a recording identifying the caller and is given three push-button options: accept the call, decline the call or decline the call and have the Privacy Manager tell the caller not to call again.

One big reason it works is that many telemarketers arrange to have their numbers blocked from being recognized by Caller ID.

Ameritech officials said the beauty of the system is based on product testing, seven of every 10 unidentified callers, often salespeople, simply hang up. That means the phone never rings.

"That's a lot of dinners, movies and bedtime stories that went uninterrupted," John Rooney, president of Ameritech consumer services, said.

Lawsuit filed against abortion doctor claims violation of privacy

WICHITA — An anonymous, unmarried couple has filed a lawsuit against a well-known abortion doctor and one of his employees, claiming the two told others they had visited the clinic for an abortion.

The plaintiffs, identified in court papers as John Doe and Jane Doe, filed the lawsuit in Sedgwick County District Court against Dr. George Tiller, his Women's Health Services clinic and an employee, Sarah Dennis.

The couple alleges its privacy was violated, because the defendants told other people the couple had been to the clinic for an abortion.

Judge D. Keith Anderson heard arguments in the case on Monday. He admitted the anonymity of the plaintiffs was unusual but agreed it could be filed anonymously.

The plaintiffs' attorney, Jeffrey Emerson, asked the court to keep Tiller, Dennis and their attorneys from doing anything that would disclose their identities.

Emerson said he thought the defense was planning to bring people close to the plaintiffs into the case.

"I have heard that they would like to interview friends, family, work associates — in short the entire circle of acquaintances of two very private people who brought this suit because they are private," Emerson said.

Defense attorney Bill Tinker Jr. asked Anderson to dismiss the case because there was no proof that any wrong had occurred. He further argued that Kansas law doesn't permit cases to be filed anonymously, except for juveniles.

Anderson agreed there was no case law allowing it but said because the case was an "intensely private" matter, it warranted being filed anonymously.

"If it comes to trial, what then?" Anderson asked. "They will have to get on the stand and testify."

Emerson agreed.

"If it comes to that, these plaintiffs might just fold up their case and get on with their lives," he said.

If the case goes to trial, the judge could allow the couple to testify behind a screen that would shield them from the public's and even the jury's view if warranted, Emerson said.

Anderson said he saw no harm to the defense or the public in keeping the couple's identity secret.

Tiller's clinic has been in the national spotlight because he specializes in late-term abortions banned in most other states.

DALLAS — Many years from now, folks in Texas will be telling their grandchildren about the summer of 1998, when the heat seemed to bake the Lone Star State to a hard enamel finish.

Security guard Beth McDonald will be able tell of how she would "go home, turn on the air conditioner, strip and play on the computer."

Mary Jo Walker's kids will recall how they were dragged to the library, pool, shopping mall and twice to Colorado — just about anywhere there was air conditioning or cooler weather.

"You can't do Chuck E. Cheese's every day," Walker said.

This was one of the hottest, deadliest and costliest summers in Texas history.

Just how hot was it?

Fifty-one times — more than seven weeks in all — afternoon highs reached or exceeded 100 degrees. Sundown brought little relief, with overnight temperatures dropping no lower than 80 degrees for a record 38 times.

Dallas-Fort Worth endured its hottest May-August on record. Overall temperatures averaged 85.9 degrees, exceeding the 85.6 average in 1980.

At least 131 people died from the heat in Texas, including 51 illegal immigrants near the Mexican border. About 100 died of the heat in 1980, excluding illegal immigrants.

It was the second-driest April-August on record with 5.84 inches of rain. Only the Dust Bowl year of 1934 was drier.

The drought of 1998 went down as the costliest since the seven-year dry stretch of the 1950s, with agricultural losses estimated this time at more than $2.1 billion.

According to Texas Utilities Electric, electric bills were up an average of 30 percent over last year. Water consumption reached record heights, with 708 million gallons used by Dallas residents July 30 — 206 million gallons more than the previous record set Aug. 23, 1980.

Trees, shrubs and grass are scorched brown by the drought and heat. Many plants simply gave up.

Similar stories could be told of surrounding states, especially Oklahoma, where the heat killed 22 people and rainfall ran 12 inches below normal.

"I'm real glad the summer's over," Luke Duel, undersheriff of Oklahoma's Logan County, said. "It's been a long, hot one."

Still, like Texas native son Nolan Ryan — a hard-throwing pitcher even into his 40s — the summer showed it could bring late-career heat. Temperatures were expected to climb back into the 90s later this week.

Sheryl Boyles, 48, an office courier who drives more than 300 miles every day, doesn't plan to turn off the air conditioner in her vehicle. Don't try telling her it's fall.

"Not until the temperature changes," she said.

URGING SELF-REGULATION

Lou Douglas lecturer urges networks to take responsibility for TV violence

BY SARA MARTIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With an understanding that violence on television is a fact of life, Ellen Wartella has monitored her sons' program viewing, urged networks to self-regulate their violent shows and participated in one of the most comprehensive scientific studies to date on the context of televised violence.

"I do not like violence in the media, although I do acknowledge that some televised depictions of violence do have educational or social value," said Wartella, an expert on TV violence, Tuesday night during her speech in the Lou Douglas Lecture Series.

"The crux of my concerns is not so much with the fact of violence, always, but with the quality of violence as depicted on television today," she said.

Wartella is the dean and Cronkite regents chair in communication at the University of Texas at Austin and participated in the National Television Violence Study, which monitored TV violence from 1994 until June 1998. She presented "Chips, Ratings and Mayhem: Television Violence in Context" to an audience of 150 in Forum Hall.

While she said she personally dislikes violent programming, she also said she understands the nature of violence that has been forever present in society. She said she would rather see the industry become self-regulated than have censorship come into play.

"As Americans, we live in a violent society," Wartella said. "We have always lived in a violent society."

She said violence is becoming statistically more prevalent, however.

"In the past 15 years or so, a remarkably cavalier, vicious, wanton and senseless pattern of violence entered society and our psyche," she said. "The violence panic of this time seems much more to surround children and youth, as both the victims and the perpetrators of violence."

Television and movies are exploiting the violence readily, raking in the ratings and the money at the box office, she said.

"Violence in the media may not be the most important contributor to violence in the real world," Wartella said, "but it is surely one of the multiple, overlapping causes."

CLIF PALMBERG/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Christopher Struzina, 1998 Lou Douglas intern, listens to Lou Douglas Lecture Series speaker Ellen Wartella on Tuesday night in Forum Hall. Wartella, dean and Cronkite regents chair in communication at the University of Texas at Austin, spoke about "Chips, Ratings and Mayhem: Television Violence in Context."

However, Wartella said the answers to media violence might be the easiest to find.

"Today, we find a wide consensus among the experts that, of all the factors contributing to violence in our society, violence on television may be the easiest to control," she said.

When the NTVS examined TV violence, Wartella said the study determined it was most important to look at the acts in context.

"Violence, per se, is not at issue here," she said. "The issue for us researchers consistently has been how violence is presented on television — that is the context of television violence, not just the act of violence."

The NTVS determined that 60 percent of all of the fictional and reality-based shows studied contained some sort of contextual violence. Wartella said it has been suggested by previous studies that overall media violence has had three significant effects.

First, the viewers learn the aggressive behaviors portrayed; secondly, that prolonged exposure to this media violence can cause viewers to become desensitized to the seriousness of violence and victimization; and thirdly, that viewers might become afraid of violence and become mistrusting of others.

Violent programs, when taken in context by the NTVS, lead to three other implications.

"Most important in our study, we found that context does matter," Wartella said. "All too often, we find that violence is glamorized, sanitized and trivialized."

Violence is glamorized by showing hero characters engaging in violent acts while the bad guys go unpunished. At the same time, Wartella said the programs are sanitized and don't show the true-life effects of the vio-

Importance of agriculture in Kansas lures dean back to home state

■ Dean plans to launch large fund-raising campaign for scholarships, buildings.

BY DESIREE LAMBERSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Editor's note: This is the eighth installment in the Collegian's "Meet Your Dean" series.

For someone who never claimed K-State as his alma mater, Dean of Agriculture Marc Johnson has become an important fixture in the lives of many faculty and students.

Johnson's agricultural experience started at a young age. He grew up on a farm south of Wichita, where his family owned orchards and specialized in growing various tree fruits. His family also owned a store in town.

"We had a country store where we brought in vegetable produce from around the county and then sold it," Johnson said.

Johnson pursued his undergraduate studies in biology and chemistry at Emporia State University and later attended North Carolina State University as part of a science and society program.

"I got quite an infusion of multidisciplinary approaches on issues, but I focused on economics and international development," he said.

Johnson earned his doctorate in agricultural economics at Michigan State University and later transferred to K-State to be head of a department.

"Kansas State was first of the leading agricultural states," he said. "I thought being department head in agricultural economics in a very agricultural state was an important thing to do."

Johnson is also director of K-State Research and Extension, an organization with $90 million and 1,200 employees.

JOHNSON

"We have county extension offices in every county and research sites in 15 different locations outside the university, as well as all the departments on campus," he said.

Throughout the years, Johnson said he has witnessed many changes, including increased attention to the agricultural industry, a greater emphasis on the quality of teaching and advising, and more professors working with other departments to solve problems.

"They use their science to solve problems and their education to make the public aware of the problems," he said.

This year, Johnson said he planned to put additional emphasis on international study by creating more opportunities for faculty and students to travel abroad.

He said he also plans to launch significant fund-raising campaigns for scholarships and a new building and facilities for the Department of Grain Sciences.

"We have a targeted goal of $4 million as part of the university's $50 million campaign," he said.

Associate Dean Larry Erpelding said Johnson has immense concern for the students.

"Dean Johnson is vitally interested in students and their successes before and after graduation," Erpelding said.

"He has promoted efforts to encourage students to experience other cultures and types of agriculture, economies and political systems through international study and travel."

Minimum wage hike worth reconsidering

Minimum wage needs to be increased to a level high enough to be a living wage.

That's what Senate Democrats tried to do Tuesday — raise the minimum wage from $5.15 per hour to $6.15 per hour. Pay increases would have gone into effect on Jan. 1, 1999, with an initial 50-cent increase.

Senate Democrats certainly had the right idea. According to their statistics, workers earning minimum wage can only earn about $10,700 a year — certainly not enough to support a family. With long hours for little pay, there is no room to work to improve, no time for night classes and no money to spend on them.

A minimum-wage increase would allow greater latitude to improve one's position, while welfare benefits could be diminished. That could mean government spending on other projects, or a decrease in taxes.

Since a majority of K-State students currently work at the $5.15 rate, a minimum-wage increase also could help the local economy. Though a raise would increase costs for local businesses, it also would put new spending money in young Manhattan consumers' pockets.

Unfortunately for the underprivileged, Senate conservatives are unlikely to vote for a minimum-wage increase at this time. Had Democrats pushed the bill through before the legislative break in August, the economic climate would have afforded them greater opportunity to ratify the bill. Since August, however, numerous instabilities in the market have left many wondering about whether or not the U.S. economy will hold, especially under continued strain from a distressed world economy.

Earlier this week Alan Greenspan, chairman of the Federal Reserve, asked Congress to avoid legislation that would destabilize the economy. Providing 12 million Americans with higher earning potential at the cost of reducing profit margins for companies would definitely be a destabilizing force, the effect of which could be recession or depression.

It is unfortunate that policy-makers are faced with a decision that could help end poverty in this country at the risk of total economic collapse. We believe that minimum wage should be increased, but the Democrats' proposal is too much too fast.

Speaking out own beliefs not dependent on religion

Editor,

I couldn't agree more strongly with Professor Bob Page's comments about the words "In God We Trust" minted into our coinage (Readers Write, Friday) Yes, sir, if you carry so much as a penny in your pocket, you'd better not speak out for what you believe in. Just renounce your citizenship and move to ... Antarctica, maybe?

Congress added those words without consulting you or me, and they just as easily could be removed. Well, no, I guess not. Not during this period of what I sometimes think of as "bullying Christianity."

MONICA JONES' DIARY

Bridget Jones meets Monica Lewinsky

Nov. 17, 1995

222 pounds (need to work on this if I'm ever on television. Yeah, right!), alcohol units: 3 (working in the White House takes it toll. Why? Why?), cigarettes: 0, cigars: 5, calories: 6,347.

8:30 a.m. Watergate: my flat. This is not a good day for hair. I'm thinking beret. I'm thinking yes, like it, girl. A saucy French beret, like I'm Mary Tyler Moore throwing my hat into the air with a twist. What is it about a beret that adds mystique to the charm of a singleton like me?

9:44 a.m. Fizzlewit. While arranging my beret, I totally forgot to pick out clothes. Toss open doors to wardrobe. Can't wear the Gap dress, gave it to Mom for safe-keeping. It looks like conservative day. A nice little jacket that is easy to strip away to reveal my French-cut hosiery. Hosiery ripped when trying to pull over thighs. I'll wear my thong instead.

5:10 p.m. White House. I think I'm starting to catch the attention of the big chief. After eating some pizza and letting him fondle my bosom, I gave him what most men really want. Why? Why? This is why I went to finishing school?

With his face glowing in reddish autumnal colors, Bill whispered, "I'm usually around on weekends. No one else is around, and you can come and see me."

I know what he meant, though. We singletons know what all married men want. I want a man, a baby, a nice house on Chesapeake Bay with the most powerful man on earth serving me fruit slushies with tropical umbrellas stuck in the top. And all he wants is me coming around on the weekends.

10:30 p.m. On the phone with best friend, Linda. Talking with Linda is therapy for me — to know there's some other ugly knob out there who's frightfully overweight, single with kids and just got bumped out of the White House. She asked how my relationship with Bill was going. Like I'm going to say "Yeah, I give him oral pleasure on my knees in his private study while he works out policy with congressmen on the phone and then ends it with an offering of official White House mints." Instead, I offer, "Fine." And I know Linda is thinking, "Knee Queen!"

11:55 p.m. Can't sleep. The sight of the Washington Monument outside my flat reminded me of Bill. Why don't you erect some more monuments to the members of men? Just another souvenir of my doomed life as a singleton. Thankfully, there are no images of babies to haunt me. Tick, tock. Tick, tock.

228 pounds (Yee-God! My work is high in calories, I guess.), alcohol units: 13 (I will cut down. Maybe after I get my job at the U.N.), cigarettes: 0, cigars: 4 (for practice), calories: 3,268.

5:32 a.m. My flat. This has got to be the day. Will march into Oval Office and demand he treat me with respect. Draw a hot bath with salts and slip in to relax. Think I'll smoke a fag in the tub.

3:21 p.m. Oval Office. Betty Currie, Bill's secretary, keeps hounding me about my love life. What is it about old women where they want to know every detail about your pursuit to find a man? Is she trying to make me more depressed? Why doesn't she just say "Stay away from the prez, honey, you ain't shagging him today."

Bill looks good this afternoon. All the harder to spring my thoughts about our thing on him.

"Why don't you ask me any questions about me?" I rather bluntly exclaimed. "Is this just about sex or do you want to get to know me as a person?"

After playfully laughing, Bill replied, "I cherish the time that I've had with you."

I'm thinking, what? He doesn't even know me. After five times together, this is the kind of superficial smug married reply I get. Bad sign. Umph.

12:21 p.m. Oval Office. Bill ended it. This is the feminist power I have — the man ends it. "Durr!" I cried. How could I let him see me cry over this. Why? Why? I wish I could just walk away from it all, but I can't.

6:30 p.m. My flat. I've called the White House all day and can't get through to Bill. They're keeping me out. I left the White House like a good girl in 1996. I'm part of a new generation of women who won't concede the average relationship. I want a career and the president at the same time.

9:23 p.m. Just hung up the phone with Linda. She's nice to me. I guess Linda and Cosmo are right. You can't trust a man anymore. No, trust is reserved for mass media and sitcoms. Is it too late to catch that whole lesbian chic movement? Maybe I'll give her my copy of "The Feminine Mystique" when I meet her at the Ritz.

Medical advances yield more questions than answers

Every day, a part of science fiction becomes a part of reality. Things the wildest imagination never dreamed 50 years ago are now accepted as routine scientific procedures. The field is expanding. As it does, the world grows more complicated.

In particular, the advances made in the field of medicine tend to draw the most criticism and moral debate. The latest breakthrough to grab the public eye has come in an area of medicine to which we all owe a lot: reproduction. Scientists at the IVF Institute in Fairfax, Va., have found a method of determining which sex chromosome individual sperm cells contain.

Researchers found that sperm cells carrying the Y chromosome contained 2.8-percent less DNA than cells carrying the X chromosome (cracks about men being genetically challenged are not lady-like). So far, their method has been 93-percent accurate. This accuracy likely will improve as the procedure is fine-tuned.

While I haven't yet heard much public outcry over the morality of determining your child's sex, it inevitably will come. For some time, the cost of the procedure likely will be prohibitive enough to limit its use. Though eventually it might become common practice, then the cries will swell.

The only real arguments I have against sex-determination include the possibility of upsetting the balance of the sexes. This has happened in some countries where couples are limited in the number of children they are allowed to have. These limits generally cause a lot of families to keep male children. I would like to think that we are not as sexist and wouldn't follow suit.

Another argument against sex determination would be that it takes all the mystery out of a woman's pregnancy. Ultrasound technology has long since made it possible for couples to know the sex of their babies prior to birth. Some people think knowing in advance ruins the fun in the same way nosing through your parents' closet as a kid could ruin the suspense of Christmas morning.

Determining your child's sex prior to conception is taking it a step further, by removing 93 percent of the suspense. It's sort of like buying all of your Christmas presents for yourself, leaving nothing to surprise you but the credit-card bill. I already can imagine the arguments that sex determination is likely to spawn between couples. Stereotypically speaking, dad wants a son with whom to throw the football around, and mom wants a daughter with whom to go shopping.

Not so long ago, a group of Scottish scientists renewed the moral battle over cloning with their sheep, Dolly. Many people might have preconceived notions as to why Scottish researchers would be interested in cloning sheep, but the real reason would be the cell stage at which the embryonic genome becomes active in sheep zygotes. It took 277 eggs to yield one cloned Dolly.

The controversy was largely over the possibility of cloning humans. However, in humans, the embryonic genome becomes active at an earlier stage than in sheep. Considering the number of sheep eggs it took to make one clone, and the fact that the process would be more difficult in humans, I don't think human cloning by this procedure is anything we will have to worry about too soon.

The rallying cry of the cloning opponents was that it was "playing God." Cloning does occur naturally, though, in many animals including humans; when a zygote divides into two separate cells, you get identical twins. If cloning is playing god, then organ transplants must be worse, still. Nowhere in nature do you see organs of healthy animals ending up in diseased animals. Few people continue to oppose organ transplants, and eventually the hoopla over cloning will die down as well.

With each discovery, the world has something new to consider, new choices to make and new questions to answer.

READERS WRITE

Fortmeyer's pointless criticism makes him paper's worst columnist

Editor,

For a writer, you could do a lot worse than Russell Fortmeyer.

From his annoying sarcasm to his endless supply of pointless criticism, he shines as the least interesting of the Collegian's writers.

Maybe it's his desire to pose as a member of the Collegian's intelligentsia, crafting glorious commentary from the Collegian office. Or surely it's his all-encompassing knowledge of all things artistic. Even Frank Lloyd Wright, if found alive, undoubtedly would give an approving nod to Fortmeyer.

Fortmeyer — his whining knows no bounds!

Is this invigorating wave of annoying editorials sweeping into your apartment? Just what is it that makes Russell Fortmeyer so different, so inviting?

As K-State President Jon Wefald might say if he would return my calls, "I validate your disdain for Fortmeyer. He seems to know nothing about anything."

Such are the intriguing currents of thought pouring from our figurative heart. Do remember that as one travels down the line of power at K-State from president to student, the statements get less intelligible, but usually more interesting.

"Uh ... what?" A K-State student might ask such a question in a sure-fire nod to his pointless editorials.

Although the benefits of living near such an important media influence are certainly large in number, there are benefits for those of us who are forced to live in more, shall we say, backwater locales.

For instance, living far from Fortmeyer practically guarantees that one cannot see him from one's window — even as a dot on the horizon. The fact that I am not forced to look at him, or even daily consider his existence, is more positive reinforcement than any overpaid analyst or wife could provide. As one who walks to class, which requires me to pass Fortmeyer for a brief spell, I've often wondered why a super-tunnel could not be dug to avoid this visual interruption.

Ultimately, one is forced to recognize him, if only to take part in realizing that he manages to fill space on otherwise blank paper.

Is it really fair for K-State to have such an important political and cultural commentator when the rest of the country's newspapers are forced to settle for bland writers whose only import to the reader is to provide interesting reading? Are we selfish for having Fortmeyer when others settle for valid news, reviews and other opinions?

The decision of other papers, but not the Collegian, for ignoring writers like him is a tradition that fortunately skipped us.

At K-State, he acts as everything we could ever desire — a literal showplace for the best of K-State.

How many of us attend class early if only to read Fortmeyer's columns? Who doesn't anticipate his latest drivel when K-State is electrified with intriguing gossip and discussion as the enormous flow of concentrated intelligence erupts before us?

These thoughts leave us with the question — Will it last? Can such a Promethean flame really burn as bright so long? How much longer, dear Wildcats, can our campus continue to sustain this annoyance?

THE BOMB SQUAD

STARRING: JAMES GARCIA & MARTIN GRAMATICA

BRANDON WHITE/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Punter James Garcia gets a punt past Nebraska player Eric Warfield last season during the Nebraska game. Thanks to Garcia's leg, K-State leads the nation in net punting average.

JEFF COOPER/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State place kicker Martin Gramatica celebrates after a successful field goal during the Sept. 12 game against Northern Illinois. Gramatica has made four of five field goals and has kicked all but four kickoffs in 23 attempts for a touchback.

K-State kickers give Cats leg up

BY JON BALMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The next time you hear long-range bombing in the distance, don't assume it's the sound of practice drills at Fort Riley. The likely source might be KSU Stadium, where punter James Garcia and kicker Martin Gramatica have been dropping bombs of their own this season.

Although Gramatica received most of the spotlight after connecting on a record-breaking 65-yard field goal against Northern Illinois on Sept. 12, Garcia made a case for himself this past weekend against Texas after two booming punts, one that traveled 78 yards with the wind and another that carried 67 yards into the wind.

Although things didn't look promising before the contest, Garcia said his punting came together when it was needed.

"It was just one of those days when everything clicked," he said. "During pregame, I was having a lot of problems with my drop into the wind.

"It wasn't until my last couple of kicks that I started to hit the ball pretty good. When it came time for the game, I just did what worked toward the end of pregame."

Garcia's two solid punts added to an already solid senior campaign. Through three games, Garcia has averaged 55.3 yards on six punts, results that add heavily to K-State's leading the nation in net punting average.

The 78-yard punt against Texas stands as a career best for Garcia, and it couldn't have come at a better time. A native of Victoria, Texas, Garcia said the motivation to perform well against his hometown school was a big factor, although it didn't overshadow his focus.

"In pregame, seeing the Horns come down and everything, it really got to me," Garcia said. "But once the game actually started, it was time for business."

The concentration and drive evident in Garcia is mirrored by Gramatica. A native of Buenos Aires, Argentina, Gramatica has used this drive to pick up some impressive hardware, including last season's Lou Groza award for the top kicker in the nation.

Due to their similar nature, Garcia said a bond on and off the field was formed.

"The important thing about Martin and I is that we're both perfectionists," he said. "Martin gets really down on himself when he doesn't perform to his expectations, and it's the same for me."

When asked about the roots of his personality, Gramatica said the perfectionist inside him has been around for a long time.

"I've always been like this," Gramatica said. "I remember when I was little and playing soccer, I hated to lose. I always wanted to win. I had to do the best I could all the time."

Accepting the kickoff responsibilities this season, Gramatica has continued to excel, booting all but four of his 23 kickoffs for a touchback.

This new role has added even more to Gramatica's arsenal. Looking to repeat as an All-American, Gramatica has connected on four of five field goal attempts and has missed on only one extra point in 23 attempts.

With a desire to achieve perfection and confidence in their effort, both Garcia and Gramatica add another deadly element to K-State's special teams. Regardless of their accomplishments, Gramatica said there's still room for improvement.

"I go into every season hoping to be 100 percent," he said. "Since I can't accomplish that now, I'm aiming to be 100 percent from now on."

"THE IMPORTANT THING ABOUT MARTIN AND I IS THAT WE'RE BOTH PERFECTIONISTS."

— JAMES GARCIA

Next season could be the year for my Kansas City Royals, or so I like to dream

Judgment day has arrived, and it's time to do some serious evaluation of our boys in blue.

Before you jump to the conclusion that this is a piece of Jayhawk propaganda, take your fingers off the trigger and hear me out.

When I say the boys in blue, I'm referring to the once-glorious Kansas City Royals.

This might come as a shock to all you diluted souls who have been overcome with Chiefs fever, but Kansas City still has a baseball club not more than a James-Garcia-punt away from the hallowed grounds of Arrowhead Stadium.

While the Royals haven't experienced the glory days that George Brett and Dan Quisenberry provided for more than a decade, the 1998 Royals season — that concludes this Sunday — offered a slight bit of optimism for a change.

Although I might not have the credentials to call myself a true baseball analyst, I do have a fair share of RBI Baseball in my background, which speaks for itself.

The best place to begin critiquing the Royals is at the top, and once again, the foundation is weak. Royals general manager Herk Robinson is probably on his final tour of duty in Kansas City after continuing to deal away young talent and proven veterans.

Granted, Jay Bell was lost due to a salary cap that doesn't quite favor small-market clubs, but the dealing of outfielder Jermaine Allensworth exhibited just how poor Robinson is at evaluating talent.

What makes it worse is the fact that Allensworth was acquired early in the season for practically nothing. After so many trades that lost more than gained, it seemed as if the Royals were actually the beneficiary for a change.

However, unable to cope with actually gaining a promising young talent instead of losing one, Robinson regressed to his old ways and dealt Allensworth to the New York Mets for a minor-league player undoubtedly dubbed with the mark managers fear: Potential.

In other words, look for him to play a starring role in the Royals trivia box somewhere in the near future.

This squandering of talent should come to a merciful end when Miles Prentice obtains enough local investors to purchase the club officially. When this time comes, look for Robinson to seek employment elsewhere.

But that's enough of the downside. There were plenty of good signs coming from Kauffman Stadium this season.

Leading the way was third baseman Dean Palmer and his sudden offensive explosion. After a short introduction to Kansas City late in 1997, Palmer used his first full season as a Royal to produce some outstanding numbers at the plate.

The longtime Texas Ranger was acquired in hopes of adding power to the Royals flimsy offense, and Palmer has delivered with 33 home runs and 112 RBIs, both team leaders, as of Tuesday.

In what was one of Robinson's good trades, Palmer brought firepower back to the K.C. bats. Perhaps most important, though, is the fact Palmer, like Jeff King before him, actually appreciates Kansas City and the community around him.

With power back in the lineup, other Royals' hitting has improved as well. Jose Offerman has turned in a stellar season at the plate, and Hal Morris came out of nowhere to lead the league in average early on, before tapering off to his current .313 average.

While the Royals stand 13 games below .500 going into Tuesday's contest with Detroit, the components needed to form a winning ball club appear to be in place. Sure, the bullpen needs to be fine tuned, and pitcher Kevin Appier, who has spent most of the season on the disabled list with a broken arm, could afford to be a little more careful around baby showers next time.

Regardless, the Royals look poised to enter 1999 with a new owner and, more importantly, a new identity. With a couple of breaks and a few good trades, the Royals could win back Kansas City's faith and actually challenge Cleveland for the Central Division crown next year.

A former member of the "Kids for Quiz Club" still can dream, can't he?

'Urban Legend' brings superstition to life

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tonight will be a real scream.

"Urban Legend," TriStar's new thriller, will make its college premiere at 8 p.m. in Forum Hall.

Tonight's showing will be presented by Network Event Theater Inc., Certs and Union Program Council's Satellite Theatre Committee.

"Urban Legend" refers to modern-day folktales and silly stories, such as the rumor that alligators reside in the New York City sewer system.

The latest urban legends are being spread around New England's Pendleton College, the setting of the movie.

Thanks to the rumors and stories, the students and faculty of Pendleton are being murdered in strange, gruesome ways.

A group of courageous students tries to unlock the mysteries of the killings.

UPC and Network Event Theater Inc. premiered several films last year, including the Gwyneth Paltrow love story/romance, "Sliding Doors," and the thriller, "I Know What You Did Last Summer."

SHOW INFO
Urban Legend will premiere tonight at 8 p. m. at Forum Hall.

UPC President Karen Schlabach said she thought tonight's turnout would be as good as those for other screenings.

"We're expecting a full crowd," Schlabach said. "The turnout will probably be similar to the premieres we've had in the past."

For the college-premiere screening, tickets were available at the UPC office, on the third floor of the K-State Student Union, last week.

However, Schlabach said tickets for "Urban Legend" were gone by Monday afternoon.

Schlabach said she thought that due to the remaking of several horror films this year, "Urban Legend" will be well-received by students and audiences nationwide.

"This is supposedly a big blockbuster," she said.

"Old horror movies are making a comeback, so we expect every seat in Forum Hall to be full."

"Urban Legend" will premiere in theaters nationwide on Friday.

Fashion changes with new season

BY LINDSEY FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fall in Kansas is a season that knows no color boundaries. White, black, gold and silver; mix them up for day and evening wear.

Disregard the old wives' tale about not wearing white shoes after Labor Day. This fall and winter white has a significant role in wardrobe.

Designers Ralph Lauren and Donna Karan introduced a new line of white garments-conveying romance and femininity-for their fall advertising season. White turtlenecks, wide-ribbed sweaters, down-feathered coats and cargo pants seem to sweep the class and comfort competition. These styles in white ensure consumers a fresh, yet playful, look toward fashion.

Light colors in fall are used in signature lines worldwide. Some of the more popular colors — baby blue, yellow and cream — will be used throughout '98. These pale colors can be added to dark browns, blacks and reds. Keep in mind, soft colors mixed with rough textures can create a masterpiece.

Cashmere and mohair, delicate chiffons and crepes are assets for looking luminous in the limelight.

On the runway, these wools commonly are seen in a warm, ashy gray that magnifies the human skin. Chiffon over silk, or a bare shoulder, is sheer success.

Gray also 's used in Christian Dior's line of flannel shirts and skirts. Fashion is heavy on gray this year, but black is still a sidekick. Basic black can converge with any color.

Before buying all new clothes, search through your closet for hidden treasures. A slip dress can be worn in fall; just add an unbuttoned linen blouse or a wrap. Contrast light colors under dark suits, cardigans and plaids.

Ellen Tracy and Ann Taylor have a high hold on this year's fashionable suits. The designers maintain a classic style of suit that is forever sophisticated.

As early as last fall, advertisers boasted that skirt length does not matter. Knee-length, halve-length or mini are all acceptable. Skirts with small slits on the side really have gathered attention, and this fashion recently has been on the K-State campus. Plus, there is no better way to return to school than with an apple and a pleated skirt.

Plunging necklines and deeply scooped backs set the stage for antique jewelry, vintage beading and brocade. The crucifix, popularized by Madonna in the mid 1980s, is now an A-plus accessory.

Shopping for these fabulous finds off the runway can be difficult financially, but the day has arrived for mass production, where any fashion can be found at a reasonable price.

When shopping at a limited mall, fashion experts advise consumers to buy solids and primaries that allow optimal mixing and matching.

Seinfeld CD: yada, yada, yada; what's the deal with this thing?

BY JEFF ELLIOTT

Jerry Seinfeld should have left his stand-up comedy routine where it belongs: on a stage.

After his exit from television last spring, Seinfeld went on an international stand-up tour that had its grand finale in New York City at the Broadhurst Theatre in August.

Music Review
out of 5 stars

Not only was this the setting for the HBO Special, "Jerry Seinfeld 'I'm Telling You For The Last Time,'" it was also the recording site for a comedy album of the same name.

"I'm Telling You For The Last Time," which hit stores on Tuesday, is a compilation of Seinfeld's performances from Aug. 6-9.

He discusses topics ranging from New York City cab drivers to supermarkets and drugstores.

The album contains material that many "Seinfeld" fans will recognize, as well as the usual Jerry-isms that seem to follow the man wherever he goes.

"I'm Telling You For The Last Time" is a comedy album.

The only problem is it isn't funny; Seinfeld is mediocre at best.

Seinfeld delivers a performance the audience at the Broadhurst seems to love.

However, most listeners will search the 21 tracks album and find barely anything to chuckle about.

Due to Seinfeld's enormous fan base and success over the years, "I'm Telling You For The Last Time" is a surprising disappointment.

The album is a tough listen, and most "Seinfeld" fans will be hard-pressed to find motivation to hear it a second time through.

Research symposium proposes new ideas

BY SUZANNE WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Education researchers must lead the way to create a society that is non-violent, open, supportive, inclusive and diverse in its framework, said James B. Boyer, retired professor in the College of Education, on Tuesday.

Boyer was the coordinator of the Diversity Research Symposium sponsored by the College of Education. It offered information on recent educational research that directly correlated with diversity.

Boyer said it was the first symposium given by the college in its efforts to promote equality at every level of the academic enterprise.

"The professional educators across America have attempted to discover new knowledge, which would guide policies, programs and practice," Boyer said. "This symposium proposes to be an interactive session in which those findings can be shared on issues of diversity, equity and the quest for nonviolence."

Gail Shroyer, associate professor of elementary education, spoke about the area projects she had done in action research. Action research is designed for teachers who want to improve curricula in their classrooms.

Shroyer said most educational research is done to help improve a large area and focuses on the teachers and their students. It gives the teachers an opportunity to take the responsibility for a change, Shroyer said.

Project Pride was an action research project Shroyer worked on for elementary students at Manhattan's Woodrow Wilson School. She said the focus was to improve science and math scores for students who have trouble in those subjects.

Shroyer said once the research was done and the new curriculum was put in place, scores in math and science improved dramatically.

"My hope is that we can get more teachers involved in action research, because I feel it is the key to school improvement," Shroyer said.

John Hortin, associate professor with the college and a symposium speaker, works with Kansas City students required to do a research project. He said students there are committed to the projects because they have experienced many of the educational problems firsthand.

Hortin said research there has shown teaching needs to incorporate parental involvement, technology similar to magnet schools, an understanding of how individuals learn and higher expectations.

Hortin said many of the students make a new curriculum to incorporate their findings. They want teachers to be aware of the changes that need to be made.

"Diversity issues in educational research means expanding the research dimensions, further analyzing the research assumptions, reviewing the research production teams, rethinking the research consumption impact, and redefining the parameters of our work as educational researchers," Boyer said.

Many audience members spoke about the importance of changing educational curricula to make a more diverse environment where students have an equal opportunity for a good education.

Three strong musical personalities join forces for a performance that will surprise and delight. Fleck is an avant-country banjo player, perhaps best known for his work with the Flecktones. Marshall plays a variety of instruments from the mandolin family and has performed with the David Grisman Quintet, Stephane Grappelli and Mark O' Connor. Meyer, a composer who's at home playing bluegrass and recording country music in Nashville. The concert features a winning mix of Bach, bluegrass, jazz, and world music, with a little R&B on the side.

Sources say Republicans will bring impeachment inquiry

By DAVID ESPO
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON D.C. — Republicans intend to bring a formal inquiry of impeachment to the House floor within the next two weeks, GOP sources said Tuesday. Democrats renewed talk of a lesser sanction for President Clinton, perhaps a censure along with a financial penalty.

The maneuvering in Congress unfolded as the White House, after digesting nearly 3,200 newly released pages of Kenneth Starr's evidence, lashed out at the independent counsel for ignoring "all reasonable standards of fairness in preparing and drafting" his highly publicized report to lawmakers citing evidence of impeachable offenses.

In particular, Clinton's lawyers wrote the Judiciary Committee contending that Starr's report included 150 pages of "gratuitous and graphic sexual details." At the same time, attorneys David Kendall and Charles Ruff wrote, Starr excluded this statement that Monica Lewinsky made before the grand jury: "No one ever asked me to lie, and I was never promised a job for my silence."

Several Republican sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said work had begun on drafting the terms of an impeachment inquiry, legislation likely to empower the panel to conduct its own investigation of the facts in the case. It was not clear whether the Judiciary Committee would be limited to investigating matters contained in Starr's report, or would be authorized to range more broadly, perhaps into other areas Starr is probing, or perhaps into alleged campaign fundraising violations.

It is likely some action will be taken before Congress adjourns, said one Republican aide. Other officials said the most likely time for a vote on the House floor was the week after next. Congress has set Oct. 9 as its target adjournment date.

CLINTON

The disclosure came as Republicans on the Judiciary Committee met to review the panel's work thus far, and plan its next steps. Among the decisions to be made: the terms under which more than a dozen boxes of Starr's still-secret evidence would be released. These include grand jury testimony by several key figures, including presidential secretary Betty Currie, Clinton's friend Vernon Jordan and Linda Tripp.

Even as committee Republicans were meeting, officials were preparing for a session today in which Speaker Newt Gingrich, Republican leader Dick Armey, Democratic leader Dick Gephardt and the leaders of the Judiciary Committee would sit down to discuss the impeachment review.

A similar meeting two weeks ago produced pledges of bipartisanship from both parties, but that glow faded quickly.

Democrats complained that Republicans forced the release of more sexually explicit material than was necessary, and they were unhappy that Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, made a unilateral request to a trial judge in Arkansas for a videotape of Clinton's deposition in the Paula Jones lawsuit.

For their part, Republicans complained that Democrats on the Judiciary Committee were trying to slow the release of documents that the entire House — including a solid majority of Democrats — already had voted to release.

In a sign of the ill feeling that exists, Democrats were balking at requests from Republicans that reporters and television cameras be permitted into the meeting room today for a few moments.

Privately, Democrats said they were having fresh discussion about the political equivalent of a plea bargain in which Clinton would agree to a censure, a fine and possibly an appearance before the Judiciary Committee, and Republicans would shield the president from impeachment and possibly shelter the president from legal action by Starr.

In political terms, according to two Democratic sources, merely floating such a proposal would give Democrats additional ammunition in the ongoing public relations war.

Democrats would be seen as offering a way to end the controversy, and at the same time they could back punishment for the president, two approaches that Americans tell pollsters they favor.

The suggestion that Clinton make an appearance before the Judiciary Committee surfaced on Sunday, in comments that Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., made in a televised interview. Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott said at a news conference with reporters the idea would "probably be a positive development," and Kerry telephoned Gingrich to review the idea, although an aide to the speaker said the two men did not get into a substantive discussion.

Hurricane Georges continues path of destruction

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SANTO DOMINGO, Dominican Republic — After plowing through the northern Caribbean, Hurricane Georges carved into the Dominican Republic on Tuesday, uprooting trees and churning the sea as Dominicans and tourists fled to shelter.

The mammoth storm was on a trajectory that could send it crashing into the Florida Keys by late Thursday or early Friday. Authorities urged tourists to leave the island chain, as residents began boarding up windows in anticipation of Georges' fury.

The storm caught the Dominican capital of Santo Domingo almost entirely unprepared Tuesday. Forecasters had expected it to hit only the northern coast, but Georges, which killed at least 10 people in its furious march across the Caribbean, changed course and headed straight for the tropical capital of 3 million people.

Even more than in Puerto Rico, where Georges exploded shop and car windows, flipped small airplanes and whisked away satellite dishes, damage in the Dominican Republic was expected to be extensive.

In this poor country where the minimum wage is nearly $140 a month, the wooden houses that line riverbeds and hillsides would be no match for the storm's 110 mph winds.

In neighboring Haiti, which shares the island of Hispaniola and is also in the storm's path, people prepared to battle the hurricane amid even more profound poverty.

As darkness approached, Dominican President Leonel Fernandez told his countrymen the island's fate was in God's hands.

"For the moment, the only thing left for us to do is to raise our prayers to the Almighty," the president said.

In the Florida Keys, visitors were urged to take airline flights while they were still available or to leave before the rush by way of the Overseas Highway, the only road linking the 110-mile ribbon of islands.

David Chorney, a meteorologist at the National Hurricane Center in Miami, said there was a good probability that Georges would hit Florida.

"As far as intensity, it's still too early to tell what it's going to do," he said. After crossing the Caribbean islands and getting back over water, he said, "there's a good chance it could redevelop and strengthen again."

The storm already caused Puerto Rico what is expected to be hundreds of millions of dollars in damage. The entire island lost power, and most had their water cut.

Five people were killed on the island, and tens of thousands took refuge in shelters.

lence, such as death, pain and suffering, or even punishment. Trivialization occurs when violence is shown as humorous.

At the top of the list of solutions to TV violence is a rating system for the V-Chip on televisions so parents may monitor and block out offensive programming.

However, Wartella said she favors other methods as well.

"Television shows need not be sanitized or insipid. They need not be all smiley faced or falsely optimistic about the worlds they depict," she said. "All we should hope for is that they be more honest, truthful, realistic and sensitive to the very impressionable young minds upon whom television has such a great effect."

At the top of the list of solutions to TV violence is a rating system for the V-Chip on televisions so parents may monitor and block out offensive programming.

In order to make these measures more effective, Wartella stressed the importance of an educated child.

"We must devalue violence and teach our children that violence is not a valid currency for ordinary exchange," she said.

"It doesn't get us where we need to go. It is a last resort, only a means of mere survival, and even then, it has grave consequences."

Topeka kindergarten student expelled for 186 days

5-year-old brings 9 mm pistol to class; gun discharges in book bag

By CARL MANNING
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Concerned parents met with school officials Wednesday to express their views after a 5-year-old boy brought a loaded 9 mm pistol to his kindergarten class, where it discharged while in his book bag.

No one was hurt in the Tuesday incident at Quincy Elementary School, which has about 250 students (grades kindergarten through fifth) in a working-class neighborhood about a mile north of the downtown area.

"It was miraculous that nothing serious happened. We feel very lucky," Principal Scott Henson told reporters after the private meeting with about 50 parents in the school gym.

Henson said the boy's book bag was hanging in an open-front locker, and the pistol apparently fired when he brushed his bag accidentally with a rest mat he was taking from a shelf.

The 20 pupils in the room were getting ready for a noon rest period when the pistol fired in the room, located in the middle of a long hallway lined with other classrooms.

Henson said the youngster, whom he declined to identify, was expelled for 186 days, as required by state and federal law. He said school officials will conduct a hearing into the expulsion.

Jim Gilchrist, the Topeka school district's security chief, said the youngster was released to his mother Tuesday night after talking to officials.

"Initially, the child was very upset and crying," Gilchrist said. "It scared him more than anything."

Gilchrist said no charges have been filed and the investigation was continuing. He also said he believes the boy is the youngest student to have been caught with a gun at a Topeka school.

"We know he brought it from home, but we don't know who the last adult was to have it," Gilchrist said. "Once we identify the adult, we will send a report to the district attorney and ask that charges be filed."

Shawnee County District Attorney Joan Hamilton said a 5-year-old is too young to be charged with a crime in Kansas, but the person who provided access to the weapon could be charged.

Most of the children in the all-day kindergarten class — one of two at the school — were unaware that anything had happened.

They were taken outside, and most thought they were just having another recess, Henson said.

The principal sent a note home with the children Tuesday afternoon, advising them of the meeting to hear from parents and to bring them up to date on the facts.

"An incident like this produces strong concerns in all of us," Henson said. "The biggest concern was the safety of the children — what will be done today and tomorrow."

Robert Mcfrazier, the school district's associate superintendent, attended the meeting and said the mood was varied among the parents.

"It was the type of temperament you would expect," he said. "It ranged the gamut of anger, shock and frustration."

Lisa Johnson, president of the school's parent-teacher organization and mother of an 8-year-old girl and 7-year-old boy at the school, was among those in attendance at the meeting.

"What we don't need are (metal-detecting) scanners and irate parents," she said.

"What we need are concerned parents who are responsible enough to come into this school and help."

Johnson said that other meetings are planned.

Classified employees meet with legislators

COLLEGIAN STAFF

Classified employees and members of Classified Senate attended a forum Wednesday in Hale Library to meet and visit with area legislators. The event was the first of its kind. Classified Senate invited the legislators to the forum to discuss items of concern or interest.

A panel of four area legislators answered questions and listened to comments. Area legislators present were Sydney Carlin, candidate for state representative for the 66th district; Jeff Peterson, state representative for the 66th district; Kathy Lloyd, state representative for the 64th district; and Kent Glasscock, state representative for the 66th district.

One concern was stopping the job cuts mandated by previous state legislative action.

Since 1993, $1,414,270 has been returned to the state from classified positions cut through retirement. The state saved funds by not continuing to pay an employee in these positions, according to a Classified Senate report.

A need for a sunset clause to prevent loss of positions was one concern expressed by those at the forum. The clause would enable hiring for needed positions.

Other state initiatives also were discussed.

According to Classified Senate, a 7.6-percent pay increase is being proposed for all classified employees.

"It takes a while to bring things around," Carlin said. "But I believe that if we work together, it can be done. I'm tired of state workers making minimum wage."

One concern posed was opportunity for advancement. K-State offers tuition assistance for campus employees, but only for studies pertaining to their jobs, said Classified Senate President Cheryl Grice.

"I don't think the recruitment process takes away advancement opportunity," Grice said. "Things are set up so that if you have the minimum qualifications, both internal and external applicants have a chance at the position."

The meeting was a step forward for

Billboards spur protest at KU

By STACY MORFORD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE, Kan. — Graphic anti-abortion billboards comparing aborted fetuses to the tortured corpses of Holocaust victims sickened and angered students at the University of Kansas during this week's Jewish high holy days.

One student was arrested after ramming his car into the display, and another punched one of about a dozen men propping up the series of large signs.

The same cloth billboard comparing the Holocaust to abortion also showed a photo of a Civil Rights-era lynching over the words "Racial Choice."

KU Chancellor Robert Hemenway canceled all campus tours involving children and sent a rare e-mail to all students and faculty saying the university regretted the displays had "caused a great deal of distress to many members of our community." He explained that the university needed to maintain its role as a forum for free speech.

The man who organized the week-long display said he would make no apologies for the Holocaust comparison.

"Abortion is genocide. That's the whole point," said Gregg Cunningham, director of the Los Angeles-based Center for Bio-Ethical Reform.

"Frankly, I'm weary of genocide snobs who focus solely on their causes."

The group took the signs to Pennsylvania State University for a similar protest during Passover and has 15 to 20 more protests planned at campuses across the country, he said.

Cunningham said the timing with the Jewish holidays was not planned.

Cunningham and the Wichita-based Heartland Life Network arranged the University of Kansas protest through a club for Christian law students that was formally organized last week. The club's faculty

Chamber of Commerce receives national award for membership

By ELIZABETH SCHOFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Chamber of Commerce won the National Association for Membership Development (NAMD) Award of Excellence for 1998 Chamber of the Year Sept. 5 in San Diego, Calif. The award is given annually and is open to all chambers nationwide. The Chamber received the award for success in retaining and increasing membership and for the scope of programs and services it offers for its members and the community.

In June, the Chamber was selected as a top-10 finalist. The NAMD notified the Chamber in July that it was a top-three finalist and invited representatives to the NAMD's Annual Conference September 4-7 in San Diego.

The chambers are divided into three categories based on income from dues. The Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, which falls into the $200,000 to $500,000 category, competed against more than 1,100 other chambers for the award.

"Just to get into the top 10 was remarkable," Chamber President Dan Colantone said.

Colantone represented the Chamber during a final interview at the conference. The 30-minute interview consisted of questions about the role the Chamber plays in the community and issues of economic development, Colantone said.

"Whenever you speak in front of your colleagues it is challenging," he said. "I was a little nervous."

The Chamber expanded its business membership by 23 percent over the past 18 months and is in the middle of a membership drive titled "900 'n' 99" that runs through the end of this month.

City Commissioner Ed Klimek said Colantone is very focused on his mission. "The Chamber of Commerce under Dan Colantone is very aggressive," Klimek said. "The award is a reflection of that mentality."

The Chamber works with the city on economic development. It also receives a

Elevator reopens after fatal June explosion

HAYSVILLE, Kan. — The DeBruce Grain elevator, ripped apart by an explosion in June that killed seven workers, has quietly reopened.

The first few grain trucks began delivering crops to the salvaged southern end of the elevator Tuesday, and traffic was heavy on Wednesday, company spokesman Dennis McCulloch said. The facility will be able to receive grain by rail next week and will begin shipping grain out by rail in October.

"The company made a very conscientious decision to low-key this event. We thought it was very inappropriate to do it any other way," McCulloch said.

No celebration or announcement was made, and the opening was handled in a very businesslike way, he said.

Among the workers who have stayed with the elevator was Robert Goin. He is the son of Howard Goin, one of the seven workers killed in the June 8 explosion. Howard Goin's remains were found July 22 in one of the grain bins by workers vacuuming out wheat.

Workers were offered a severance package if they wanted to leave after the explosion, but most stayed with the company, McCulloch said. DeBruce now employs 12 workers, plus an additional three to five contract workers.

The explosion at the DeBruce elevator south of Wichita came just as farmers were to begin the wheat harvest. The loss of the facility, one of the nation's largest, put a strain on storage space around the state.

McCulloch said the company would not release its rebuilding costs.

In the rebuilding process, DeBruce has made changes in the operations of the 45-year-old structure to resolve grain dust control problems. Those include outside legs — used to move grain from trucks to the bins — as well as enclosed belts in the basement.

Campus phonebooks available in October

If the closest you can get to remembering your adviser's phone number is 776-5577, it's time for some help.

Campus Connections is due out October 5.

The directory, published by Student Publications Inc., contains local and permanent addresses for students, faculty and staff. E-mail addresses, phone numbers, years in school and majors are also listed. The information is provided by the Office of the Registrar.

It also includes coupons, office and housing phone numbers and Manhattan and K-State maps.

Campus Connections will be available to students for $3.75 Oct. 5-14 in the K-State Student Union Courtyard and near the Stateroom. It also will be sold in Kedzie 103 for the remainder of the year.

One of the changes this year is the cover.

"We wanted something different than the Powercat or the football team," said Amy Shaneyfelt, senior in mass communications and advertising manager for Campus Connections.

Shaneyfelt said she wanted to increase the book's availability.

"A lot of on-campus people are familiar with it," she said. "My goal is to get better awareness to off-campus students."

Campus Connections will be available at some apartment complexes in their main offices.

Appeals court rules 'Don't ask, don't tell' doesn't violate rights

NEW YORK — An appeals court on Wednesday overturned a lower court's decision and ruled the military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays doesn't violate constitutional rights to due process.

The 2nd U.S. District Court of Appeals reversed the decision of a judge who ruled in 1997 that the policy discriminates against gays.

The ruling comes on a 1994 lawsuit filed by six gay members of the military, who said they were considering an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

All six now risk dismissal because they came forward and said they were gay, and they didn't think the policy treated them fairly, said one of their lawyers, Beatrice Dohrn.

A Defense Department spokesman on personnel, Lt. Col. Tom Begines, said the Pentagon had no immediate comment.

The Justice Department also had no comment. A department spokesperson, Chris Watney, said federal appeals courts in California, Virginia and Missouri have issued similar rulings since 1994, when the policy began.

The Clinton administration adopted the "don't ask, don't tell, don't pursue" policy as a compromise between the views of gay-rights advocates and those flatly opposed to homosexuals in the military.

Under the policy, gays can serve as long as they keep their sexual orientation to themselves and do not engage in homosexual acts. Otherwise, they can be honorably discharged. Commanders may not ask service members their sexual orientation.

In his ruling last year, U.S. District Court Judge Eugene Nickerson said the policy infringes on the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment by subjecting only gay and lesbian troops to a separate, discriminatory set of regulations.

Nickerson criticized the military for its history of intolerance toward homosexuals, at one point calling the term "unit cohesion" a "euphemism for catering to the prejudices of heterosexuals."

But the appeals court rejected his arguments, concluding that the policy is constitutional.

It said that beyond clear-cut cases of discrimination based on race or gender, "courts are ill-suited to second-guess military judgments that bear upon military capability or readiness."

Springsteen, Joel top list of 1998 nominees to rock hall of fame

CLEVELAND — Paul McCartney, Bruce Springsteen and Billy Joel head up the list of 15 nominees for induction into the Rock 'n' Roll Hall of Fame next year.

McCartney is already in the hall as a member of the Beatles. If he winds up on the inductees' list this time, it would be for his work as a solo artist.

Blue-collar rocker Springsteen was nominated without his longtime backing group, the E Street Band, because he released his 1973 debut album, "Greetings From Asbury Park, N.J." as a solo artist.

Musicians are eligible for nomination to the hall 25 years after the release of their first recording.

Joel, whose gift for melody sometimes has drawn comparisons to McCartney, has been eligible for induction for three years.

Also nominated for induction are doo-wop groups the Flamingos and the Moonglows; gospel singers the Staples Singers; rhythm and blues singers Solomon Burke and Curtis Mayfield; singers Darlene Love, Gene Pitney and Dusty Springfield; heavy metal group Black Sabbath; jazz-influenced Steely Dan; and early rockers Del Shannon and Ritchie Valens.

Ballots with the list of nominees were mailed this week to the more than 800 artists, producers, journalists and music industry executives by the Rock 'n' Roll Hall of Fame Foundation. The artists who win induction will be announced in November.

The Rock 'n' Roll Hall of Fame and Museum, where exhibits on the inductees are kept, is in Cleveland.

'MID-WEEK ADRENALINE'

United Black Voices Gospel Choir practices songs, devotion every week

BY LYNETTE ABITZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Shouts of praise, clapping and singing ring out of Danforth Chapel on Wednesday evenings. These sounds come from the United Black Voices Gospel Choir.

The nearly 55-member choir practices songs and spends time in devotion to God each Wednesday. La Barbara James Wigfall, adviser of the choir and associate professor of landscape architecture, said the students enjoy this "mid-week adrenaline."

"It gets me through the other half of the week," Shondra Brown, junior in accounting, said.

The UBV is a campus group created in the early 1970s by the Sigma Theta sorority and Black Student Union.

In the past, the choir has traveled to Iowa and Nebraska to sing at the Big 12 Black Student Government Conference and has been used on recruitment trips. It has performed during the sunset vigil for Martin Luther King Jr. Day and performed as the finale to the jazz festival at K-State.

The choir also tries to do one free and one fund-raising concert locally. The choir also performs at area churches.

Wigfall said it is growing experience for students involved.

"We're here to help students to come to leadership and to lead by Christian example," she said.

Verneta White, president of UBV and senior in life science, said her experience with the choir has been beneficial.

"I think most importantly it has helped me grow in Christ and my spirituality," she said. "It has helped me to realize what my purpose in life and in school is."

White said she has three main goals for UBV this year. She said she wants the choir to grow on a more spiritual level, grow in size and to have fun in Christ.

Wigfall said the choir has grown in her 11 years as adviser.

She said that four and a half years ago there were only six people, no director, pianist or robes. Since then, the choir has begun to have a stronger association with the Black Student Union and has sent out flyers to incoming freshmen to recruit members.

Wigfall said there are still aspects of the group that need assistance. The choir is looking for a pianist, and it needs to buy more robes.

She said she would like to see the group have ensembles to do things on campus and also to form a Friends of UBV group to have people support and advertise the group. She said this could involve more students and touch more people's lives.

Wigfall said anyone is welcome to come worship with the choir. She said it helps the choir grow.

"It's not about being any particular race or ethnicity," she said. "We welcome anybody who wants to sing to God."

The choir practices at 6 p.m. Wednesdays in Danforth Chapel.

Technology dean puts students as top priority

BY JENNIFER WHITE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Editor's Note: This is the ninth installment of the Collegian's "Meet Your Dean" series.

SALINA, Kan. — Dennis Kuhlman has only been dean of the College of Technology for 18 months, but already, he has begun to have an effect on the campus.

In this short time, Kuhlman said he has examined the college to assess what is needed to make K-State-Salina a better learning environment.

"Emphasis this year is on students and student retention," Kuhlman said. "We want to provide students the opportunity to not only succeed but to excel."

KUHLMAN

Student life is something Kuhlman is familiar with. K-State-Salina Student Body President Zach Griggs said students know Kuhlman well.

"He does a good job at getting out around the campus and informally talking with each of the students during lunch period and other times when the student population is focused," Griggs said.

Kuhlman said the distant location of the K-State-Salina campus requires him to focus on the perception of the campus.

"We are the only remote campus in the K-State family, therefore we have some uniqueness," Kuhlman said.

Uniqueness not only in respect to K-State but also to other universities, he said.

"When K-State is compared with other colleges, the other colleges do not have a technology college, so there is little to compare us to," Kuhlman said.

Salaries and funding for equipment are two challenges Kuhlman will face in the coming year.

"Our programs are very equipment-oriented, and it is a real challenge to keep our equipment up to date so our faculty can teach," he said. "We must provide the technology and quality of teaching that the industry demands of our students."

Griggs said Kuhlman is involved with student activities.

"Our Student Government Association hosted a Wildcat Welcome Week of our own on campus that included two weeks worth of activities," Griggs said. "Dean Kuhlman was in attendance at nearly every event and as a participant."

Griggs said Kuhlman not only actively participates in campus life but also offers much more to students.

"The most noticeable and outstanding qualities that Dean Kuhlman has brought to the campus since his arrival are his action-oriented style, his laid-back demeanor while always coming across serious and a strong sensation of this campus being felt among students, faculty and staff as a highly educated and intelligent campus," Griggs said.

WHAT "SPECIAL" COMPONENT MIGHT BE THE DIFFERENCE FOR THE K-STATE FOOTBALL TEAM?

Some things don't live up to their billing, no matter how trendy they seem.

Well, we've been in the biz long before drinking anything "skinny" or "tall" was an issue. Committed to doing it right and inventing along the way, we were the first to make sure no one cries over scalded milk (our thermometers know that 162° is very bad). We're the only ones that pour fresh frothed milk into every cappuccino, instead of just scooping dry foam on top. At ERC, it's a science and an artform.

Focus of sleep-out lost in tents, pillows

Silver Key members slept out Tuesday night to raise awareness and money for the Manhattan Emergency Shelter. The sleep-out is meant to give participating students and passersby a feeling of what it's like to be homeless.

Silver Key members slept in tents with sleeping bags and pillows, and they had food and coupons brought to them. When's the last time you saw a homeless person sleeping in a tent?

It's wonderful that Silver Key members use the homeless sleep-out to raise money for the shelter, but somewhere in the last four years the member have lost their focus.

Those who participated in the first sleep-out four years ago found cardboard refrigerator boxes to sleep in for the night. While those students probably did have warm clothes, sleeping in the cardboard meant they were "roughing it" a little more than in subsequent years.

The goal of the sleep-out is great, and obviously it brings the homeless issue to light. We applaud their efforts but urge them to think of a way to make their one-night plight more realistic. Silver Key wants to educate students and Manhattan residents about the homeless problem.

But they need to show the homeless problem for what it really is. In a roundabout way, sleeping in tents with warm sleeping bags and pillows almost makes a mockery of the plight of the homeless. How many homeless people simply wish for a warm coat or a sleeping bag every night? The homeless in Manhattan probably wish they could have slept in those Silver Key tents Tuesday night.

Any way you look at it, the sleep-out does accomplish its goal. It is a means to an end. And for that, we are proud of the organization. But there is a need for getting back to basics next time around. Silver Key really could make a point next fall by proving to those who might be unaware that homelessness really is an issue needing to be addressed.

President Clinton a 'real man'

Editor,

I take issue with the editorial board's position that President Clinton should resign. Personally, I'm glad to know that there is a "real man" running the White House.

Evangelist treated with no respect

Editor,

Monday afternoon an evangelist was sharing his faith in the free-speech zone at the K-State Student Union. So what's with the taunting and insults coming back at him from listeners? While I differ some with his beliefs, I — and I suspect many in that crowd — are fellow Christians. And this is the free-speech zone, and this is America, and this is a university campus. We speak of the need for convictions and values; here was someone subjecting himself to abuse sharing just that. The responses were disheartening.

Easy to overlook other sports with success of KSU football

Editor,

Like most people living in the K-State area, I spent Saturday afternoon watching the football team shut down Ricky Williams, and thus handily defeating the University of Texas. I am proud to be a member of this campus community, proud of the accomplishments of Coach Bill Snyder and our team. And yet, I read the Collegian's sports page with dismay on Monday morning for two reasons. (1) By reading the Collegian one would think the only athletic event on the planet was this football game, and (2) I was shocked to see the continued use of the term "lynch mob," despite all the racist connotations associated with this reprehensible phrase.

Tell me, is America today driven more by the bottom line or by the enlightened principles it was founded on? Using a term like "lynch mob" in a newspaper headline legitimizes the term and minimizes the fact that it refers to a racist activity one would hope most Americans are not proud of. Are all men really created equally when we allow such language to remain within such institutions as our newspapers? This is the insidiously invisible language of privilege, and I for one can not stand by and let it go unnoticed.

For those who missed it, there was another phenomenal athletic accomplishment this weekend. Brazilian Ronaldo da Costa stunned the marathon world with a new all-time fastest performance of 2:06:05 to win the Berlin Marathon on Sunday. That's a 45-second improvement over the former world best set in 1988.

The marathon is a 26.2-mile test of anyone's strength and endurance — it is included in the modern Olympics as a tribute to the principles of the original Olympiad as well as the ancient Greek struggle for democracy. By leaving this new world record performance out of the paper, the Collegian merely reflects the general xenophobic attitudes of many Americans : "If it didn't happen here, it doesn't matter" or "You can't make any money from it, so what's the point?"

The majority of Americans have lost sight of the athletic and political ideal expressed in the Olympics and instead have fallen in love with the spectacle of conspicuous consumption seen in modern football, monster truck races and WWF. I call this the "Gladiator mentality" — perhaps this could explain why in 1983 there were more than 200 American men who ran under 2:20:00 for the marathon and fewer than 70 in 1997.

There's far more money in the conspicuous consumption sports than in track and field, and we are allowing this to affect every aspect of our culture. Specifically, this "Gladiator mentality" has infected the Collegian's language in reference to race and requires some rethinking.

COLLAPSE OF THE NEW CAMELOT

Clinton, Kennedy parallels prove slightly premature

VIEWPOINT

KEN WELLS

OK. One column on this, and then I'll forever hold my peace.

Please tell me you weren't one of the many people who, after his first election, dared compare Bill Clinton to John Kennedy. If you didn't, enough people did that a "new Camelot" loomed over the heads of the White House's new residents, not like shining opportunities but like the specter of eventual doom. It's one thing to laud principles and ideals, but Clinton was trembling in a martyr's shadow, and no light he could shine would change that.

But he didn't need to make the darkness deeper.

The Clinton/Kennedy parallels end quickly. Chelsea grew up, something John Jr. is still partly unable to do, frozen in time with his hand held to his forehead in a heart-wrenching display of a nation's pain. Hillary could take Jackie with one hand and a blindfold; beyond reclaiming her maiden name, her legal prowess has been brought to the public forefront several times, most notably once when her work was for naught when the political sector (her husband's end of the spectrum) was unable to buoy the health-care reform through an unforgiving legislature. She also banned smoking in the White House; now we know why.

Obviously, Clinton and Kennedy share one shameful trait, one ripped open and exposed for all the world to read and hear. It's been argued the Starr report is as much an assassination as those era-ending seconds in Dallas, that both were targeted by government conspiracies. At least Clinton provided his own gun.

For me, this isn't a personal tragedy; I didn't particularly trust the man from day one. There's always been something about Clinton that reminded me of the guy immediately above you at work, the guy who will talk you into doing something he could do but doesn't want to do. "I understand you don't want to wash the sinks. Ah feel yuir pain."

Did Clinton lie? Remember his denials, before a grand jury investigating sexual harassment charges, with ground rules broad enough that almost any contact between people could be interpreted as sexual, and any Washington, D.C., lawyer would know this. You would need to be locked and chained in a refrigerator not to contact anyone sexually under these conditions. It's not a lie; it's perjury. It's a conscious act the consequences of which Clinton must be held responsible for.

For me, this entire matter is disgraceful in what it's done to others, those who believed in what Clinton, perhaps unfairly, was held to represent. I feel sorry for the feminist movement, now made conspicuous by its silence; what do you do when the man who legislates your cause disgraces it in the public sector? Likewise, the Democratic party is faced with a quandary as its effective leader is tainted at least, irredeemable at worst, and though its public front is at this writing united, you can hear the gears turning as it prepares for life after Clinton, a man whose capacity as a president is hindered forever.

Infinitely worse than any of this is the personal toll taken on by Hillary and Chelsea, and it's not something I nor anyone else needs to explore in a public forum; it needs to be left alone.

The people I don't feel sorry for were those who spent the end of 1992 crowing over this visionary leader, those who dared to equate him with legends, myths and martyrs as if daring the fates to take their best shot and strike his name into history beside their own. You'll have to flip the page to find Clinton's legacy now; through his own choices, he has chosen a different path. Contrite as he might be now (as opposed to the defiance and denial he showed in the beginning of the year while playing semantic games with grand juries), it's easy to let sorrow find voice when your hand's caught in the proverbial cookie jar. If you decided to ignore that the man was human and make him into an icon or a legend, you deserve the burn.

If you're stubborn and insist on dragging Camelot back into the picture, at least think of the original, or maybe the musical. Clinton has performed his own one-man rendition for the entire nation, playing his own Arthur and Lancelot. It doesn't take the canine nostrils of Scooby Doo to sniff out the villain in this production: Mordred's lurking, hiding under the crown.

Decent man of the '90s has clear, basic roles in society

VIEWPOINT

SAM SACKETT

I am a man. I have a role.

Men in the '90s seem to be uncertain as to what purpose they have in relation to women and other men. Men are bombarded with so many different views of what a man's purpose is that it has become unclear. While each man contributes his own qualities, there are basic roles men have.

There is a segment of the feminist movement that has attempted to coalesce, or consolidate, the role of a man with that of a woman's role. However, the two are distinct.

Man was made for woman. One of man's greatest roles as a single is to prepare himself for that woman and for his children. He needs that relationship with the opposite sex to find culmination and completion.

There are basic physical, emotional, mental and spiritual roles man has in marriage — roles that are most effective when they are carried out by a man.

Speaking of the physical role, men are generally stronger and more capable of performing strenuous labor. Even though modern technology has made it easier to survive, there still exists basic needs that a man can fulfill more adequately. This is not to say that women cannot do demanding physical work, but as a rule, men can do these things more efficiently. As for the role of propagation, men continue to be part of the process.

Emotionally, a man's role is to offer stability. It is when the man offers emotional fortitude that the husband and wife together can work through struggles. It is a critical role of men to be involved emotionally. For a man to ignore this responsibility is damaging to his family. With the man's stability and the woman's depth, understanding situations together becomes a healthy process. The reverse of this is for one side to dominate — either emotions are ignored or they become the sole basis for decisions.

Mentally, men tend to see the raw fundamentals of a situation. Men analyze from a this-is-the-way-it-is type of mentality. A man's mental role is usually to offer the basics. This allows women, who are often more detailed and multi-leveled in their reasoning, to develop an idea more fully. When the man fulfills his role of offering sound reason, men and women can work together, giving the partnership depth. If the man neglects this role, the marriage suffers, most decisions are forced solely upon the woman and children fail to see their parents working together in unity.

Spiritually, the man's role is to take the leadership position.

My reasoning, aside from readings and observation, stems from the other male roles in a male-female relationship. It makes sense that the man should act as the spiritual brunt. It is analogical to a man taking blows in defending his family from physical danger. It is only right that the man should strive to protect the woman — and this out of love.

When the man takes the initiative to lead his family in matters of faith, I believe the woman actually is able to accomplish more than she would have otherwise. In this fashion, the family is able to move forward with efficiency.

The woman is often more aware of spiritual needs at an earlier stage than the man in a relationship.

It often seems women realize the need for faith and follow this understanding by pioneering the family toward spiritual growth. I also am aware that in several marriages, the wife is the only partner who is even involved in spiritual matters.

We owe these women much praise.

Man's role concerning other men is best summed up by this proverb: "As iron sharpens iron, so one man sharpens another," (Proverbs 27:17 NIV).

My conclusion on this matter is than men must be bold in their self-discipline. We must learn to be men of our word, men of integrity and men of morality. For we are men. Let us live up to that reputation.

Hurricane Georges strikes

Storm kills at least 50, threatening Florida Keys

BY MICHAEL NORTON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti — Hurricane Georges reached Cuba and threatened the Florida Keys Wednesday after making a shambles of much of Puerto Rico, the Dominican Republic and Haiti in a furious march that killed at least 50 people and probably many more.

In Florida, up to 80,000 people were ordered to begin evacuating the exposed Florida Keys, and cars, trucks and sport utility vehicles streamed along the highway linking the island chain to the Florida mainland.

South Florida was put under a hurricane watch and Gov. Lawton Chiles declared a state of emergency in central and southern Florida, allowing the state to use the National Guard, lift tolls along evacuation routes and purchase emergency supplies.

The Cayman Islands issued tropical-storm warnings for Little Cayman and Cayman Brac.

The hurricane first hit the small islands of the northeast Caribbean early Monday, killing three in St. Kitts — where the government estimated damage at $445 million — and two in Antigua.

The U.S. Virgin Islands, which were badly battered in recent hurricanes, suffered some damage to homes, tourist facilities and utilities; on the island of St. Croix, a looter shot and killed a man who was burglarizing his home.

The effects of the storm were expected to be felt as far south as Jamaica, where officials expected heavy rains.

Three people were killed directly by the storm in Puerto Rico, where the government's insurance commissioner, Juan Garcia, estimated damages at $1 billion. Another eight, most of them elderly, died of heart attacks or asthma complications during the storm.

On Wednesday, reconstruction efforts were under way in communities like Loiza, where many homes of wood and zinc roofs were crushed and washed away.

"My sister's house is all gone, and that used to be my uncle's house,"said Luis Manso, pointing to a nearby pile of wood debris as he struggled to repair his own shattered fruit and vegetable stand quickly, before the thieves came.'

The Federal Emergency Management Agency reported that nearly a third of Puerto Rico's power was expected back Wednesday, but 715,000 remained without running water. FEMA said airport damage was minimal, and the port of San Juan reported no major damage. Coffee and plantain crops, however, were badly harmed, FEMA said.

Seventeen were officially reported killed in the Dominican Republic, which Georges hit Tuesday. However, the actual toll appears to have been much higher.

Reporters said that in San Cristobal, 20 miles east of Santo Domingo, the Nizao River overflowed and knocked down a part of a school used as a shelter, leaving five dead and another 31 missing. There were also unconfirmed reports that in the capital five more people were killed by an overflowing river.

Other media reports put the death toll at over 100. These reports could not be confirmed, but officials planned a news conference on the situation later Wednesday.

In the shanty neighborhood of La Cienega, the swollen river invaded thousands of homes, covering some up to the roofs in fetid water. Residents swam out to their houses to try to retrieve their belongings, some using empty gallon-water jugs tied to their arms to help them float.

Earlier, looters in Santo Domingo waded waist-deep in water, balancing televisions and air conditioners on their heads as 110 mph winds toppled trees and crushed houses. Bands of youths with machetes and pistols roamed the streets, many of them drunk. Two of the dead were looters shot by police enforcing a curfew.

From the Dominican Republic ,Georges proceeded Tuesday night to Haiti, occupying the western third of the island of Hispaniola.

In the poorest country in the Western hemisphere, Georges unleashed flash floods and killed at least 17.

Yolaine Surena of the civil defense authority said the government could spare only $130,000 in emergency aid.

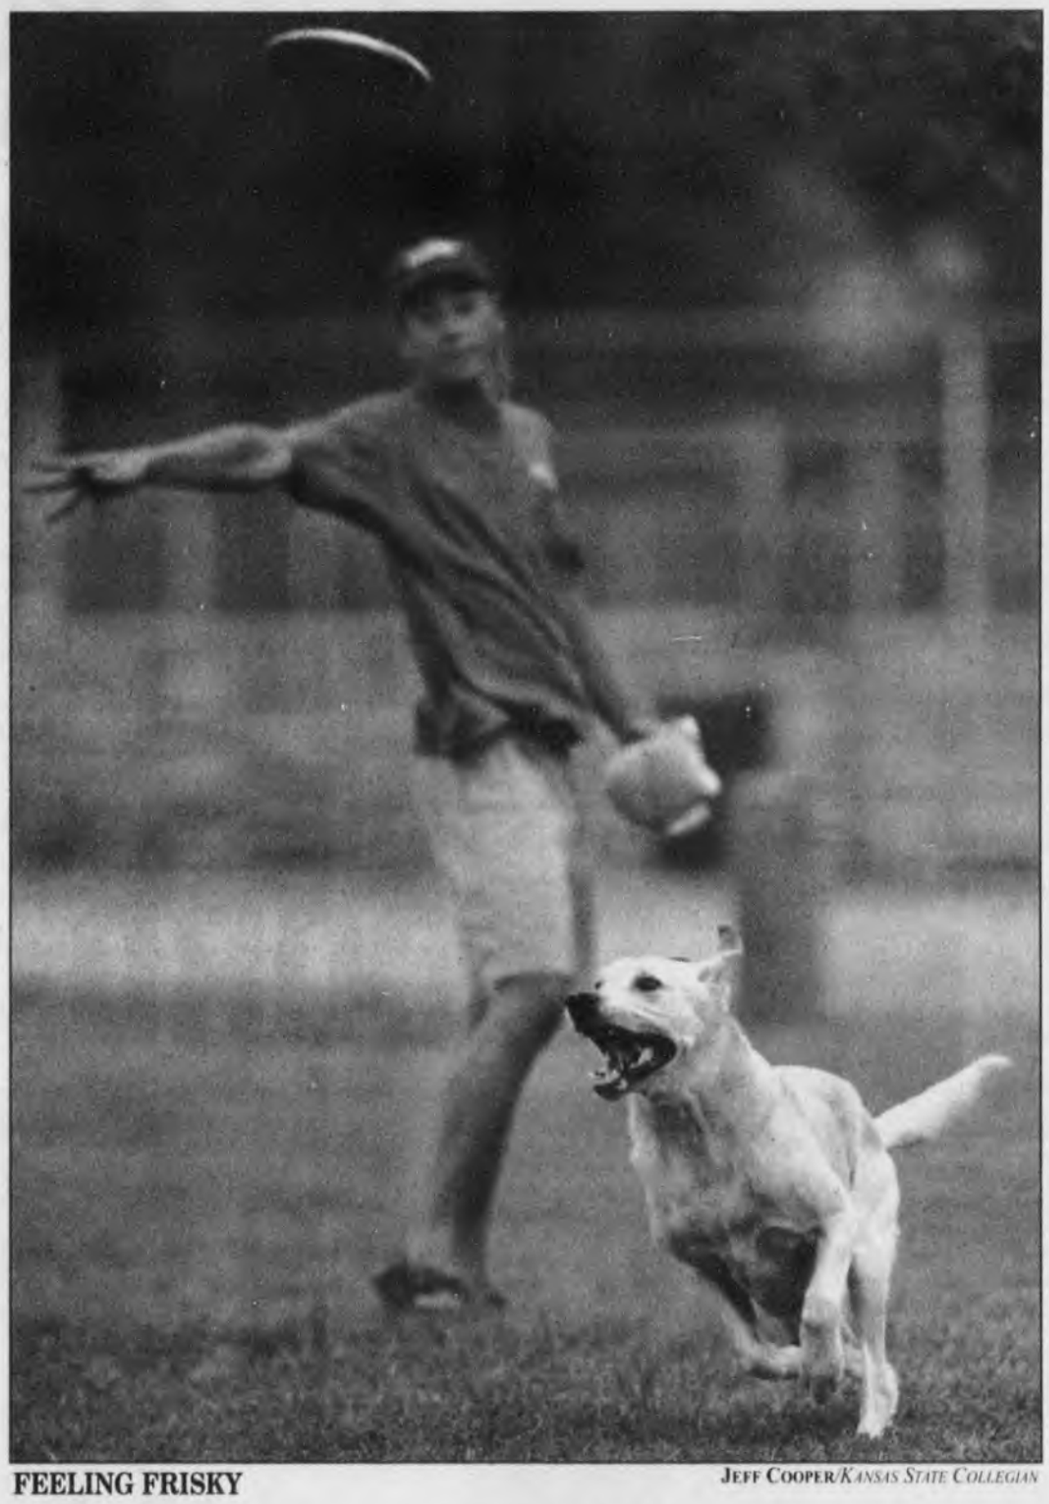
Most of the deaths reportedly occurred when floodwaters collapsed two homes in the capital, Port-au-Prince, where there were no public shelters. Four drowning victims were found in a west-side suburb Wednesday afternoon. Deaths also were reported in Gonaives and the northern town of Marmelade.

In November 1994, tropical storm Gordon killed at least 1,000 in Haiti's southern provinces, drowning them in torrential streams or burying them in mudslides.

At 5 p.m. Wednesday, Hurricane Georges was near Guantanamo Bay, Cuba and was moving west-northwest at 14 mph with maximum sustained winds at a low hurricane-level 75 mph, down from 110 mph over Puerto Rico.

Warnings were declared in Cuba from Sancti Spiritus province eastward and in the central and southern Bahamas. Cuban President Fidel Castro put his ministers on alert.

"No one will be forgotten in this new battle by the Cuban people. We are a nation that has overcome adversity with unity," Mexico's official Notimex news agency quoted Castro as saying.



The mammoth storm was on a trajectory that could send it crashing into the Florida Keys by late today or early Friday.

Georges' winds dropped from 110 mph Tuesday to nearly 75 mph Wednesday as it moved across the island of Hispaniola but were expected to strengthen over open water.

Georges knocked out communications with the U.S. Virgin Islands. Henry Laskowski, a meteorologist at the National Weather Service in San Juan, said roofs were blown off and trees were down on St. Croix, which is part of the U.S. Virgin Islands, but there were no reports of fatalities.

In Puerto Rico, residents began the sobering task of recovery.

"After the storm is always the worst,"said Paula Aponte Figueroa, 71, as she swatted at mosquitoes, the roof of her house ripped off by the winds. "You've got flooding, you've got mosquitoes, and I have nowhere to go."

In the past three weeks, athletic department officials said 32 to 42 fake ICAT membership cards have been confiscated at the gates of the stadium.

Fake ICAT cards causing problems

By JOSHUA KINDER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's high rankings in football polls are making passes for the ICAT section in KSU Stadium a hot commodity.

So hot some ticket holders have started to make their own.

In the past three weeks, officials for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics said 32 to 42 fake ICAT membership cards have been confiscated at the stadium gates.

"We've had the problem before, but we were hoping that the new lamination on the cards would deter the fake ones," ICAT President Michelle Murphy said. "In the first two weeks we took 12 fake ICAT memberships. Last week at the Texas game we found between 20 and 30 more."

The fake memberships are easy to spot by ICAT. Though some may have gotten by the gates earlier in the season, Murphy said the organization now is taking a closer look at the cards from here on out.

ICAT stands for I Contributed a Thirty; students pay $30 for the membership, which goes to the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund. In return, they receive priority seating at athletic events.

Air Force ROTC students work ICAT security.

"The Air Force ROTC is doing a great job determining whether the cards are real," ICAT adviser Missy Decker said.

"We want to make sure that the people that purchased ICAT memberships get to sit in the designated area. We shouldn't give the people with the fake memberships the benefit to sit there.

"If we find the fake ones, we take them," she said. "They get to keep the game tickets. We just won't let them sit in the ICAT area."

Most people buying fake cards don't know they aren't valid. University of Kansas graduate student Lance Miller, a K-State alumnus, said he couldn't tell any difference when he paid $40 for a fake pass.

"I really looked at it, and it looked exactly like the real ones," he said.

"It wasn't until the Texas game that I found out it was a fake. I showed it to them at the Northern Illinois game, and they didn't look twice and let me in, but last week, I was one of the first in line, and they looked at it for about three seconds and told me it was a fake," Miller said.

Miller said a person shouldn't even consider buying a membership from someone they don't know.

"If someone is selling ICAT, it isn't legit," Miller said.

"If you're buying from someone you don't know, you're probably getting scammed."

If the problem continues to worsen, Murphy said the organization may have to change its policy and reevaluate the program.

"The advisers have the ultimate say in what happens to ICAT, but I know there may be a change of some policies in the future, and it may hurt ICAT," Murphy said.

BASEBALL 1998

McGwire, Sosa unable to revive America's game

As Father Time winds down the 1998 baseball season, I've noticed that many news outlets are running stories about what a great year this has been for baseball.

The Mark McGwires and Sammy Sosas of the league have put an undeniable renewed interest in America's sport by shattering Roger Maris' home-run record. But these news outlets are resting the blame for the fans' loss of interest in the '90s on one thing and one thing only: the 1994 players' strike.

Sure the strike had a lot to do with why fans turned away from the sport, but it's not the only reason, and I'm hard-pressed to believe it's the biggest reason.

The NBA threatens to strike about twice a year, and that sport still thrives. The NFL has had similar problems, and it doesn't seem to have been hurt at all.

I think maybe I've been in this world long enough to see other reasons why baseball lost all its luster. For one thing, during the mid-to-late '80s, when I grew to love sports (in grade school), baseball was all youth really had. Sure, organized basketball and soccer for youth was just beginning to take form, but it wasn't at all common.

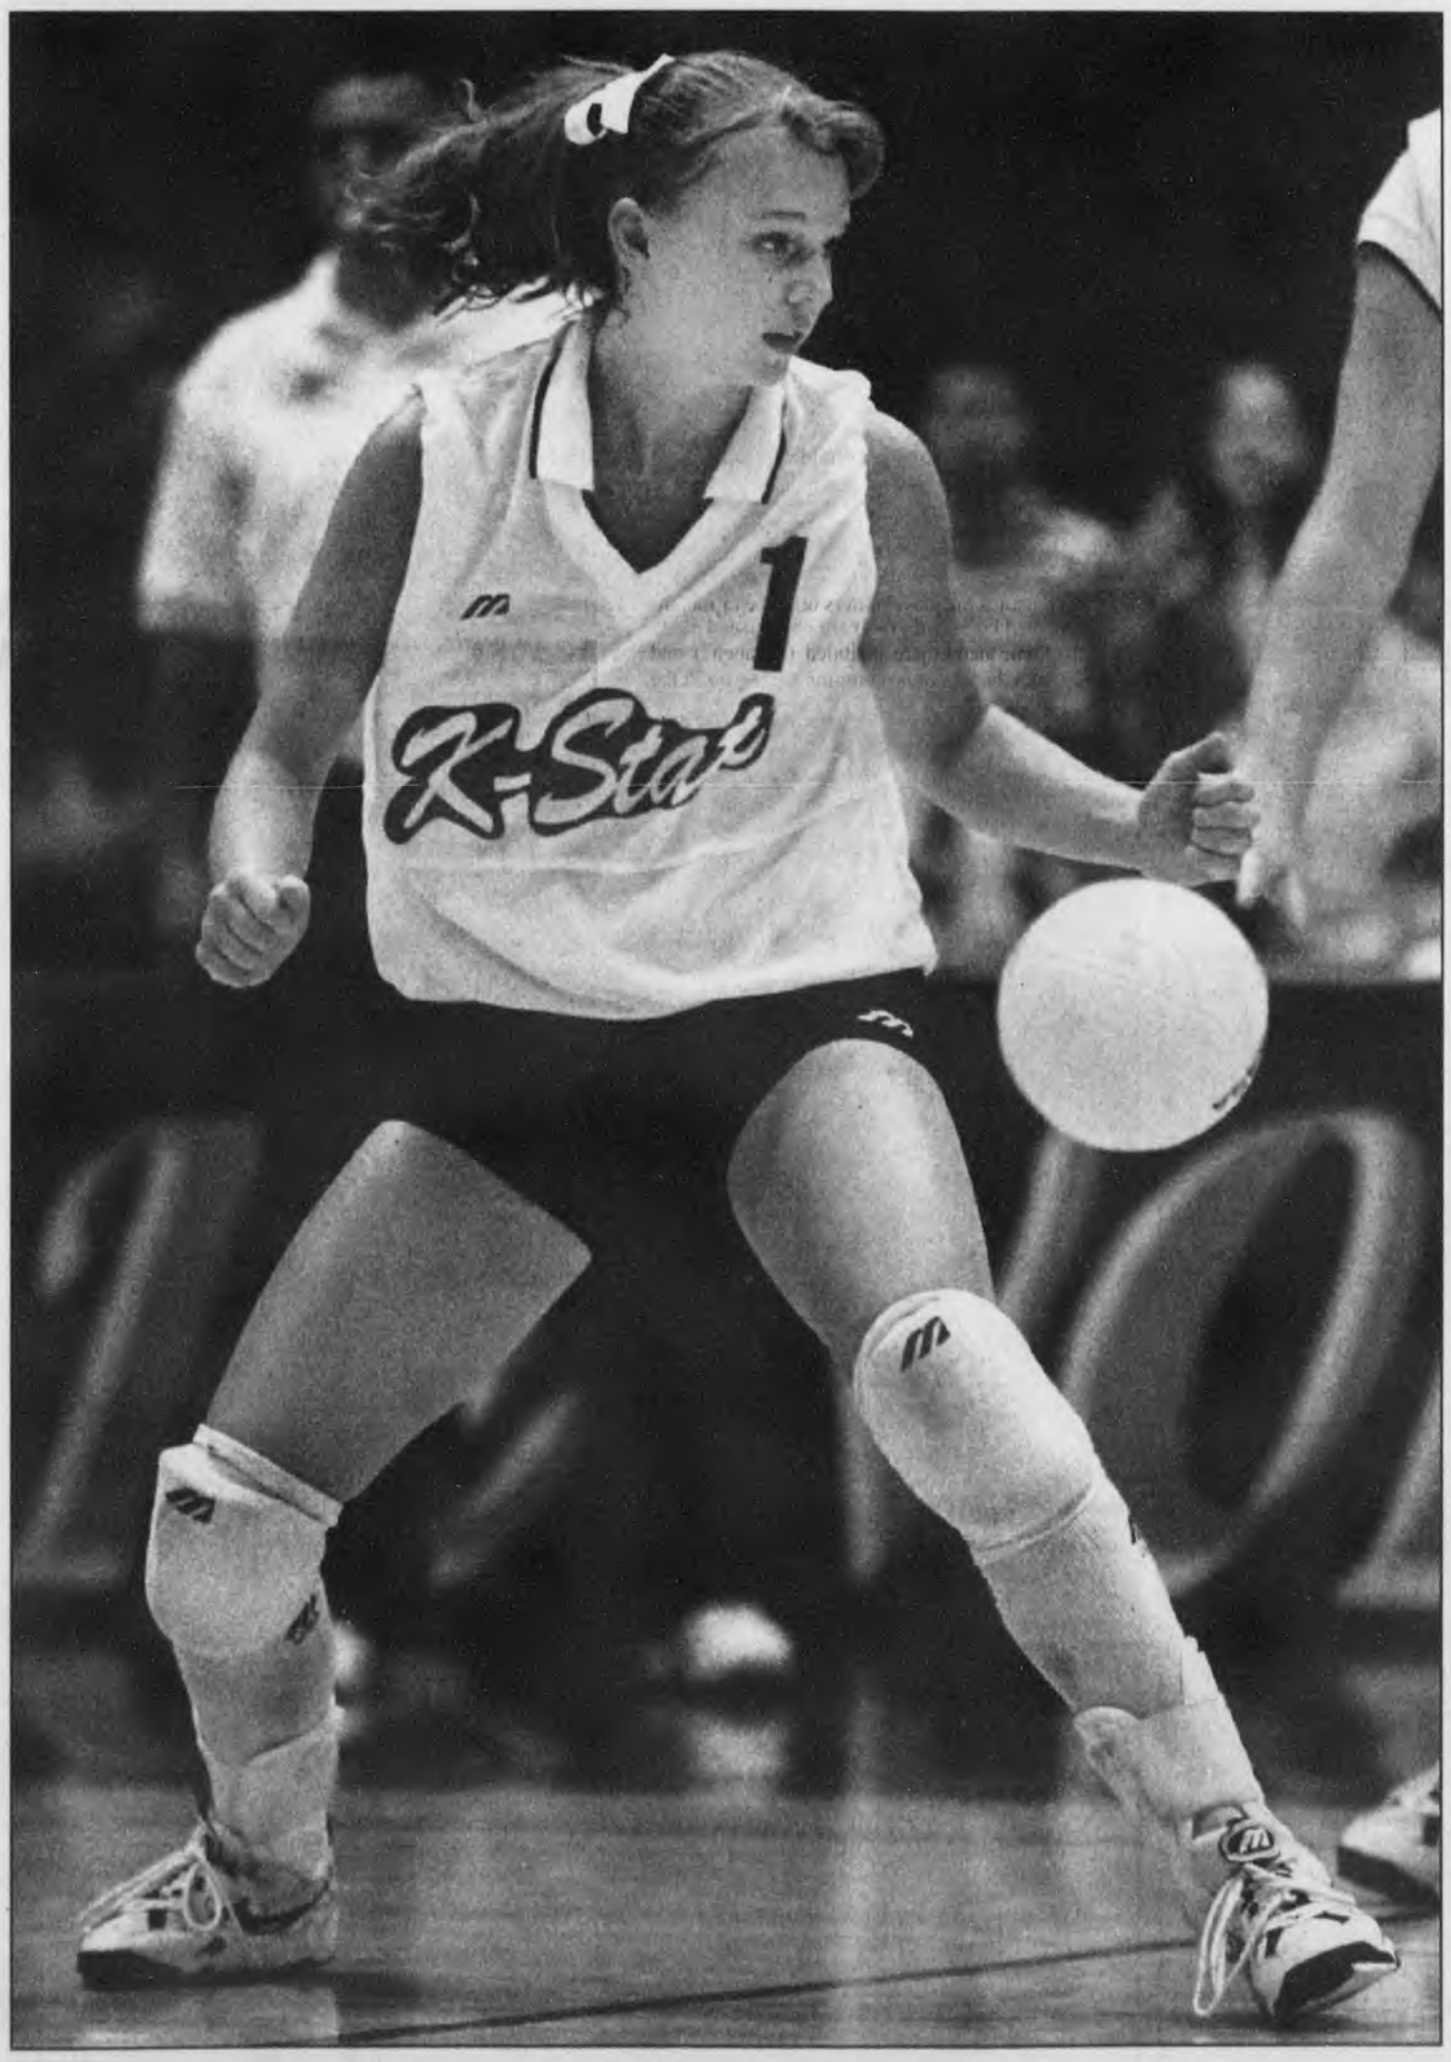
Now youth have 8,000 different sports. Soccer, basketball, football, swimming, wrestling, and the list goes on. Now all are commonplace, all at the expense of baseball.

It's amazing to me that from first grade, children get involved in sports like wrestling,. If you've ever been to a youth wrestling meet you know the intensity is unbelievable. If you haven't, imagine 500 children and parents packed into a high school gym, lined up along a mat that covers the entire basketball court, screaming and yelling at the top of their lungs, watching about six matches going on at the same time. The drama that unfolds among parents, coaches and children is as well-developed as what the pro wrestlers pull off, it's just not as absurd.

On the other end of the spectrum, when I was in first grade, all we had was T-ball. As everyone knows, the most intense thing about T-ball is braving the evening summer heat for an hour and a half. Heck, they don't even keep score in T-ball, and it really doesn't mean anything if you get thrown out trying to leg out a base hit.

But I think the thing that ingrained baseball as my favorite sport forever was the fun I had as a child collecting all those damn baseball cards. If you've picked up a pack to reminisce about your youth while standing in line at Wal-Mart, you know that the hobby you once may have enjoyed as a child has gone by the wayside. The days of buying a pack of Topps, Fleer and Donrus for a quarter are gone. I'm not even sure those brands exist anymore, but if they do, they've taken on different names and run about $5 for a pack of 10 cards.

No, it's not a hobby for children anymore. Most allowances aren't enough to support this kind of spending, and if they are, somebody please clue me in so I can use that in my next plea for money to mom and dad.



Baseball cards taught me more about the sport and its history than any other thing I've encountered. There was a time when I could name 10 players on every team, National or American League. Today, I'm not even sure I could name 10 players on the Royals' roster.

Money is also an issue if you decide to go to a ballpark and watch a game. With outrageous ticket and concession stand prices, not too many families can afford to go to a game on a whim like they used to. Unless you live in Kansas City, Mo., or some other city that still supports a pro team, you're probably lucky if you take in one game a year.

No, if you think the strike caused all of baseball's problems you're wrong. There are many more reasons why baseball is no longer America's sport.

RECORD-SETTING SETTER

Fearless freshman rewriting books on volleyball court

By BRENT STOVER
Kansas State Collegian

By the time Disney Bronnenberg arrived on campus this fall, she was well aware of the big shoes she had to fill.

After all, she would be the heir apparent to Devon Ryning — the most decorated setter ever to wear a K-State uniform.

She would be looked upon to take the place of the all-time assists leader in Wildcat history.

It comes as no surprise then that the freshman from Bloomington, Ind., admits to being a little scared in the early part of the season.

However, Bronnenberg has taken it all in stride and is quickly proving herself as the floor leader for the Wildcats.

"I love the pressure," she said. "Bring it on; I'm ready for it."

Last weekend, at the Bank of Fayetteville Classic, Bronnenberg had a tournament most volleyball players only dream about.

In three matches, she dished out nearly 19 assists per game and garnered All-Tournament team honors.

In Saturday's win over Illinois, Bronnenberg recorded 106 assists — good for the fourth-highest total in NCAA history for a five-game match.

"It was her most complete performance from start to finish," said Wildcat coach Jim McLaughlin. "She was consistently putting the ball in front of the hitters and giving them good swings."

Monday, Bronnenberg found out she had been named Big 12 Conference Player of the Week. It was the first time in Big 12 history a freshman has received that recognition.

"That's such a big honor," Bronnenberg said. "I'm so excited, but it couldn't have been done without everyone."

She said she gives a lot of credit to teammate and fellow setter Linsey Luther, who has been slowed this season due to an injury.

Bronnenberg considers Luther one of her mentors on and off the court.

"She has had so many years of experience on me," Bronnenberg said. "I appreciate her so much. When we're going through setting reps in practice, she'll critique every one of them."

It's not often a freshman is called on to be a team leader, but at the setter position, Bronnenberg has learned that she's expected to be the 'quarterback' of the team.

"After the Arkansas and Miami of Ohio matches, I totally woke up to the fact that Kim (Zschau) and Val (Wieck) can't be the only leaders," Bronnenberg said.

"The team always looks to me to give their calls. They always look to pass to me," she said.

Bronnenberg has played well, but she still has plenty to work on in the coming weeks, McLaughlin said.

"She improves every day," he said. "But there's still a lot on the table. She's got to learn a lot of things."

Disney Bronnenberg, freshman setter, reacts but misses the ball Sept. 7 against Drake. Bronnenberg was named this week's Big 12 Conference Player of the Week.

Sosa breaks out of slump, catches Big Mac with homers No. 64, 65

By ARNIE STAPLETON
The Associated Press

MILWAUKEE — Sammy Sosa tied Mark McGwire for the home-run record, breaking an 0-for-21 slump Wednesday with his 64th and 65th homers of the season.

The Chicago Cubs slugger, picking on his favorite pitching staff, homered against Milwaukee in the fifth and sixth innings, giving him 12 against the Brewers this season.

He hit a solo shot to right field with one out in the fifth off rookie Rafael Roque, who also gave up McGwire's 64th homer.

In the sixth, with two out, he hit a 2-2 fastball 410 feet to straightaway center off rookie right-hander Rod Henderson.

The ball bounced off the bleachers and back onto the grass, where center fielder Marquis Grissom retrieved it and tossed it to the infield. Shortstop Mark Loretta then rolled it to Sosa in front of the Cubs' dugout.

As he did after hitting No. 64, Sosa took a quick curtain call to chants of "Sam-my! Sam-my!"

Sosa had not gotten a hit and had struck out eight times since hitting a grand slam last Wednesday in San Diego for No. 63. He walked his first two times up against Roque, then sent a 1-0 fastball 344 feet to the opposite field, giving the Cubs a 4-0 lead.

His second homer made it 7-0 and gave him 11 multihomer games this year, tying the major league record set by Detroit's Hank Greenberg in 1938.

Sosa's 156 RBIs gave him the fourth-highest single-season total in NL history.

Tuesday night, Sosa admitted this was the worst he felt at the plate all year.

"But I have confidence in myself, and I will get out of this jam," he said.

Sosa entered the game at sold-out County Stadium two homers behind McGwire. The St. Louis star hit his 65th against the Brewers on Sunday.

The Cardinals faced Houston on Wednesday night in St. Louis, where McGwire has hit a Busch Stadium record 33 home runs this season.

Earlier this month, Sosa connected for Nos. 59-62 against Milwaukee during a three-game series.

"And none of them were cheap ones, either," said Brewers manager Phil Garner. "A couple of them we found on the freeway coming back to Milwaukee. They were rolling on I-94 out there. They thought they caught them out there on Waveland, that's baloney. They had to drop 20 cents in the toll booth when they went by."

CUTTING EDGE

NCAA Football '99 delivers digital gridiron

REVIEW BY KEN WELLS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

College football computer games haven't really received the attention or focus of their professional counterparts. There are many reasons, ranging from an inability to include actual players (legal problems) to the fact it just won't be popular, say, in Lawrence. Finally, though, college football gets the treatment it deserves courtesy of EA Sports, makers of some of the best professional sports simulations on the market.

Complete with 112 Division I schools and their rankings (and a few generic Division II teams to beat up on), most teams will find their stadium, fight song, team cheer and home-page address included.

Wagner Field is recognizable. "Wildcat Victory" isn't quite Frank Tracz quality, but still brings a blush of pride. The team chant is only mildly annoying. Still, it's fun to hear the "Go Big Red" chant while in Lincoln or the strains of "Rock Chalk Jayhawk" while romping through the grassy fields of Kansas Memorial Stadium.

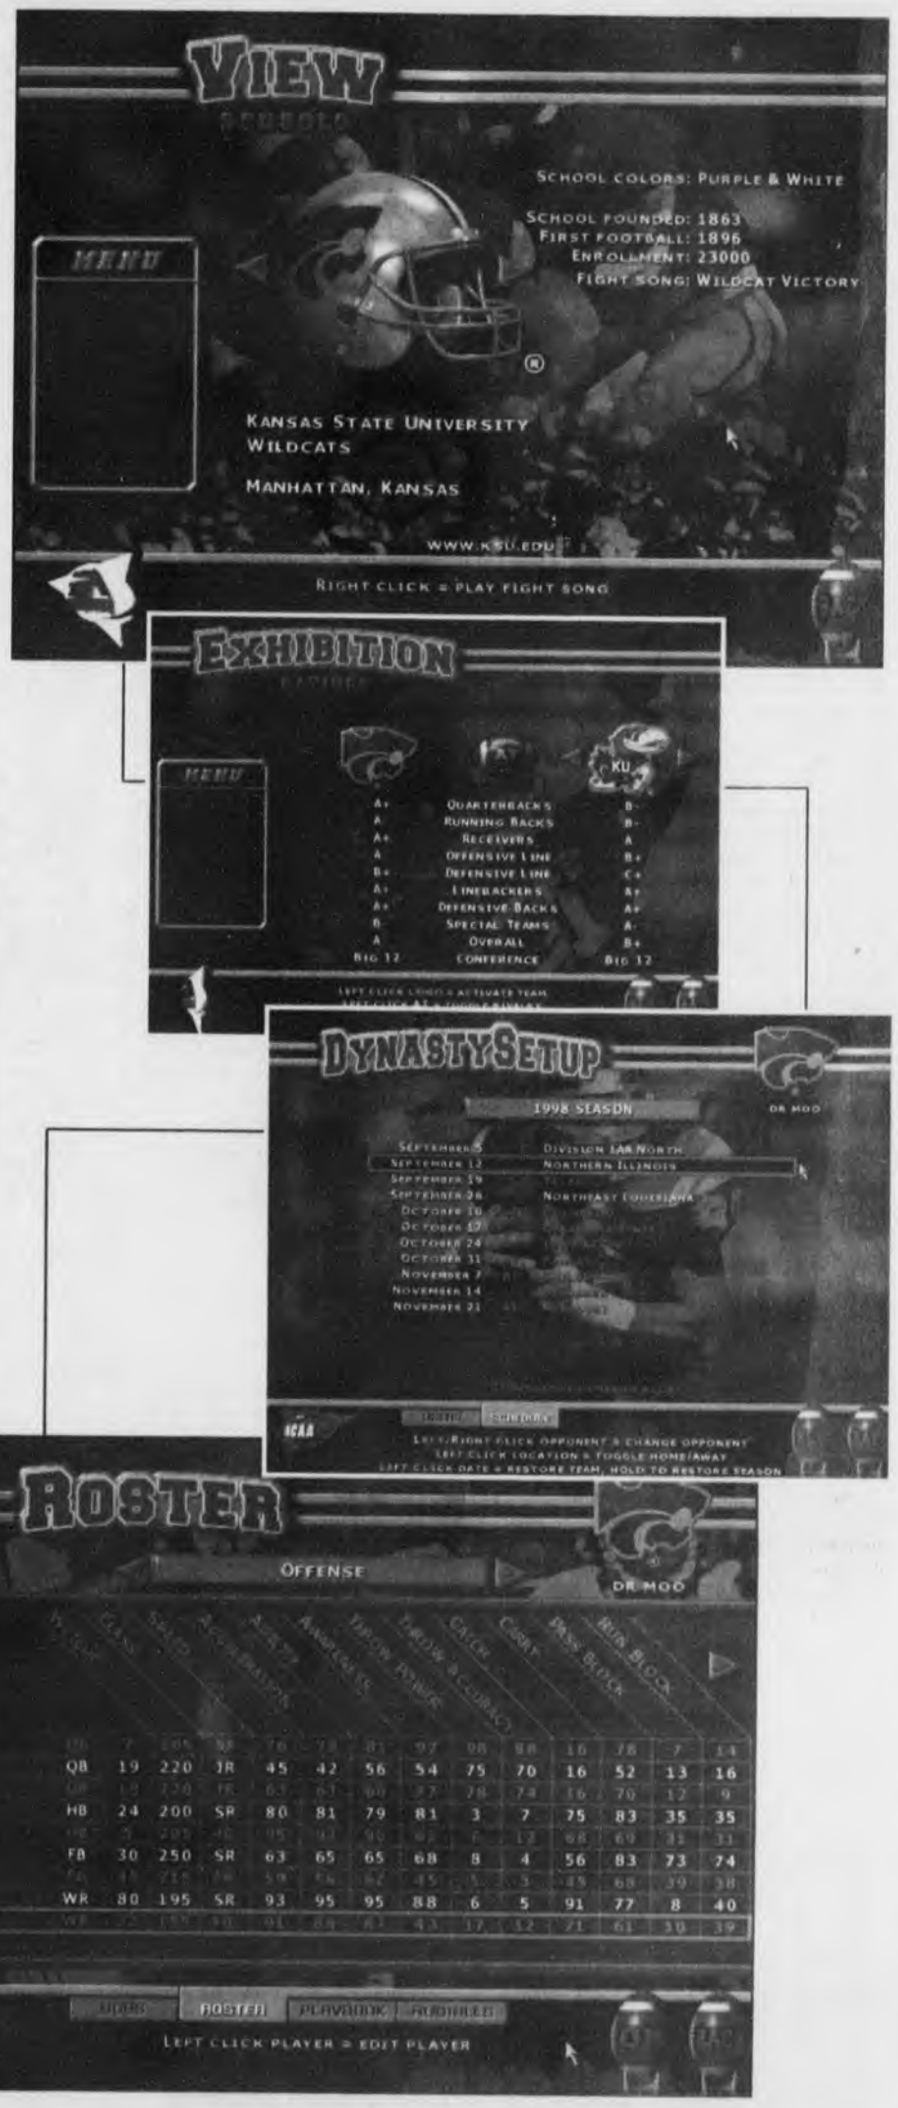
K-State fans also will be pleased by the programmers' treatment of their team; the Wildcats hold their preseason ranking of sixth and the statistics to back it up. The team's star quarterback, #7, is one of the game's best players, though they seemed to underestimate the abilities and power of the team's place-kicker.

It is possible to simulate the 1998 season straight out of the box without modification and watch the Wildcats take the national championship and the quarterback the game's equivalent of the Heisman Trophy.

Or, if you're in for the long haul, Dynasty Mode lets you helm a team for several seasons, to watch your seniors graduate and get drafted (Bishop's in-game equivalent is generally a first-round draft pick) and to recruit from high school talent. You can structure a schedule made up of high-caliber teams (Nebraska) or aim for a less-intimidating agenda (Northern Illinois). Be warned, though-If you don't do well, you might not be invited back to coach the school again and end up in Northeast Louisiana, as I did, when the Wildcats failed to get a bowl bid in 2005.

Many of the prominent bowl games are included, with plenty of fictional bowls to give you the feeling that although you've missed the big time, at least your school has made it into a bowl with a name, even if it's something like the Hunam Express Wok Bowl.

Game play is the best the sport has ever had. The players have mass and momentum; you cannot turn on a dime, but runners have improved stiff-arming ability. Kicking is guaranteed to make would-be Martin Gramaticas cringe; it's difficult at best and will take more than a little practice before you're splitting the uprights from anywhere but the center of the field. Huddles last only a few seconds, just long enough to pick a play and move back into action; the game keeps wasted time to a minimum.



Although the game doesn't have names of pre-existing players, several hundred names the player enters or those of incoming freshmen (generated by the program) are pronounced aloud during the game. Some names are included ("Branch") and some aren't ("Bishop"), but the most common names are in the voice database.

The game is not without its flaws, however. The interface needs some serious reworking as the menus are counterintuitive and require exploration before you know where all the options are. The documentation is little if any help; it's 24 pages of exploration of a game that needs at least twice that.

Wind apparently is modeled, as a windsock indicates its direction and strength, but I've yet to see evidence that it actually affects the ball under any circumstances. The simulations rely more on chance than statistics-more happiness for Ohio University than for Ohio State. The "dynamic crowds" aren't that smart; sure, they applaud sacks of the opposition and touchdowns, but they'll cheer for a 10-yard gain in the closing seconds of a game despite losing by 30 points.

There are patches on the Internet to give the 1998 starting rosters names, if you can't take the time to type in names for 40+ players on all 112 Division I teams.

NCAA Football '99 is not perfect, but it is the best college football game on the PC. It requires a lot from your computer, but it gives you back quite a bit in return. All that's missing is the tailgating.

Art Appreciation Lecture Series now open to public

■ Remaining lectures in series include variety of topics for faculty, students.

BY KELLY LYNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The third presentation in the Art Appreciation Lecture Series at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art will be at 7:30 tonight in the museum's United Missouri Bank Theater.

Katherine Schlageck, education and public programs director at the museum, said the lectures originated as training programs for docents, the students who give the museum tours. This year the lectures have been expanded into a free lecture series open to the public.

"It's been a really nice mix of people that have attended," Schlageck said.

Audiences have been made up of students, faculty and people from the community, which Schlageck said is beneficial because so much of each lecture is discussion.

Schlageck said there has been a great deal of interest from the public, considering that only three of the 20-25 people in attendance at each of the past two lectures were docents in training.

Schlageck said the remaining lectures in the series will cover a range of topics including reading and dissecting paintings; figuring out what artists mean by their work; and learning about art criticism. These topics will be explored through discussions of an artist's process, 20th century art, a specific look at the K-State collection and a workshop about abstract art.

Laura Fatemi, registrar at the museum, will give tonight's lecture, titled "From the Artist's Point of View."

"I'm basically going to be talking about the artist's process, looking at how one deals with the process of art, from the beginning stages to how the piece of art develops," Fatemi said.

Schlageck will discuss 20th century art in lectures on Oct. 22 and 29.

"We'll go ahead and look at what happened in America in the 20th century and the basic art movements," Schlageck said.

Art movements such as Regionalism, Social Realism, and the Abstract Art movement (including pop art, conceptual art and others) will be covered.

The lecture will begin with pieces from the 1913 Armory show in New York, where Americans first were exposed to artists such as Pablo Picasso.

"We really talk about the works, and I give a lot of history," Schlageck said. "This sets the stage for the specific art work at the museum."

On Nov. 5 and 12, Bill North, museum curator, will present a lecture titled "The K-State Art Collection."

"We have about 1,500 pieces in the permanent collection," Schlageck said. "He'll talk about how the collection was formed and what's in it."

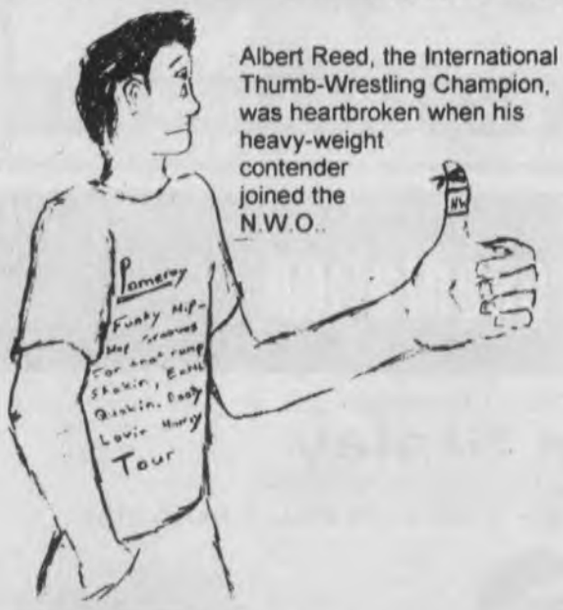
North will look at the Beach Museum's permanent collection, which is primarily composed of 20th century works by artists from the central part of the country, Schlageck said.

This collection includes works by John Steuart Curry from Kansas, Thomas Hart Benton from Missouri and Grant Wood from Iowa.

The last lecture in the series will be presented on Nov. 19. It is titled "Looking at Abstract Art: An Interactive Workshop," and will be presented by Schlageck. It will include activities where the audience actually creates abstract art.

"It's really designed to help people look at what we have on display at our museum in greater depth and then give them tools to look at at other museums," Schlageck said.

Abstract art can be the hardest to understand, Schlageck said.



"I think by doing it, people will begin to understand a little bit better what it entails," she said.

The Art Appreciation Lecture Series is one of three lecture series in progress at the museum, along with the "First Wednesdays Food for Thought Lectures" and the "Visiting Artists Lecture Series."

Peace Corps budget increase proposed

■ Increase could help add volunteers to Corps.

BY LYNETTE ABITZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

President Clinton has proposed a 19-percent increase in the Peace Corps budget. The increase would add $44 million to the current $226-million budget and could help the agency double its overseas volunteers.

The agency, which began in 1961, currently has 6,500 volunteers in more than 80 countries.

Although the budget has not been approved, Jeffrey J. Martin, public affairs specialist for the Peace Corps, remains hopeful.

"We're cautiously optimistic that we're going to get an increase of some sort," he said.

Martin said the funds could help the agency greatly.

"It will help us to do our work that much better and will also help the agency as far as morale," he said.

Lisa Wandke, a past volunteer for the Peace Corps and the Denver regional recruiter, said the increase in funds could help raise the number of volunteers.

"We're hoping to be able to send more volunteers overseas, and that countries will want to make more requests in the areas of education, environment, health and agriculture," she said.

■ ON THE WEB
The Peace Corps has a World Wide Web site that you can view at www.peacecorps.gov

Martin said he noticed a definite resurgence of interest in the Peace Corps. Last year the agency had more than 150,000 inquiries. He said not only has interest increased, but new projects have emerged.

The agency continues to work with developing countries on teaching English and working with agriculture. Now it's working in the area of business, mainly in Eastern Europe, he said.

"You're just as likely to wear a business suit as a pair of sandals and shorts," he said.

The agency also is teaching AIDS and HIV awareness and ecotourism.

Currently, 20 K-State graduates are Peace Corps volunteers. They are working in agriculture, architecture, business, education, English and political science.

Family stunned by kidnapping

■ Police still searching for answers in case involving pregnant woman's abduction; dead fetus recovered.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

FRESNO, Calif. — Last week, a pregnant Margarita Flores and her husband got a call from a woman identifying herself as a charity worker and promising free baby furniture and a year's supply of diapers.

The caller arrived at Flores' home as arranged, and Flores went off with her, supposedly to a warehouse to collect the gifts. The trip was supposed to take 20 minutes.

Flores didn't come back.

Since then, the case has unfolded with one macabre twist after another: a dead fetus, a vanishing body, a witness found hanged in a shack.

Police in the heart of California farm country are baffled by the case, and the only person who might shed light on the mystery is in jail, accused of kidnapping Flores, and she is refusing to cooperate.

Meanwhile, Flores' distraught husband, Heliodora Cruz, holds out hope for his wife's safe return.

"I'm still waiting," Cruz said Tuesday at the family's small home.

The mystery began Sept. 14 when a woman knocked at the couple's door at about 1:30 p.m., following up on phone calls about gifts for the family.

When Flores, 40, who was eight months pregnant with her sixth child, hadn't returned by 3 p.m., Cruz called friends, the family minister and police.

Police have disclosed no motive for the apparent kidnapping, but some of Flores' relatives and friends have said she was taken because of her unborn child, a girl she already had named Doraelia.

So far, police have pieced together this much:

Hours after Flores left her husband, she was seen arguing with Josefina Sonia Saldana, 40, outside a Taco Bell restaurant in Chowchilla, more than 30 miles away. It wasn't known whether Saldana was the woman with whom Flores had left earlier.

The next morning — after Flores had vanished — Saldana showed up at Valley Children's Hospital with a dead fetus. She told hospital officials that she had delivered the dead child in a car.

That same day, farm worker Serafin Rodarte, who rents a shack on Saldana's property, supposedly spotted the corpse of an adult.

The body partly was wrapped in carpet, with the bottom half of the torso visible, Rodarte told police.

But Rodarte didn't tell police of his discovery until Sept. 17, when he was questioned. By then, the body was gone.

Now, Rodarte is gone, too. He was found hanged Tuesday inside his one-room cottage, leaving apparent suicide notes.

Investigators and Flores' family were hoping the notes would shed light on the case, but those only declared his innocence and contained farewells to his family.

Saldana, meanwhile, was arrested Friday and accused of kidnapping. Prosecutors are trying to force her to submit to tests to determine whether she ever was pregnant, and if so, whether the dead fetus was hers or Flores'.

The link between Saldana and Flores is unclear. Police said they believe the connection might be at the University Medical Center in Fresno, where Saldana worked as a Spanish-English interpreter and Flores, who suffers from diabetes, high blood pressure and uterine cancer, was a patient.

Police will not say whether they believe Saldana acted alone, and Cruz, who has seen pictures of Saldana, would not say whether she was the woman who came to the family's home.

One of the few elements of the case that hasn't shocked friends and relatives is that Flores was taken in by an offer of help for her family.

Greenspan signals interest rate cut next week

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan ignited a rally on Wall Street on Wednesday by signaling that he and his fellow policy makers will cut short-term interest rates next week.

Greenspan told the Senate Budget Committee that he saw "few signs the financial crisis that started in Asia last year has subsided" and that world policymakers "have to be especially sensitive to the deepening signs of global distress."

The central bank chairman refused to say explicitly whether the Federal Open Market Committee, which includes Federal Reserve Board members and regional Federal Reserve Bank presidents, will vote next Tuesday to cut rates for the first time in more than two and a half years.

But, he assured senators, "I do not think we underestimate the severity of the problems with which we are dealing."

A reduction in short-term interest rates would cushion the U.S. economy from overseas turmoil by making it cheaper for consumers to finance major purchases and for businesses to expand and invest in new equipment.

A reduction in short-term interest rates would cushion the U.S. economy from overseas turmoil by making it cheaper for consumers to finance major purchases.

"We have to bring the existing instabilities to a level of stability... to prevent the contagion from really spilling over and creating some very significant further difficulties for all of us," Greenspan said.

Economists said his comments, coupled with last week's testimony to the House Budget Committee and a Sept. 4 speech in California, unmistakably signaled that Fed policy-makers were prepared to cut the benchmark federal funds rate, which banks charge one another on overnight loans, from its current level of 5.5 percent.

"He told us in unambiguous terms that he will be cutting interest rates next Tuesday. This is the third signal," said economist Sung Won Sohn of Norwest Corp. in Minneapolis.

Wall Street saw it that way, too. Traders, anticipating favorable testimony, had driven the Dow Jones average of industrial stocks 99 points higher even before Wednesday's hearing began.

Two hours later, the average closed up 257 points at 8,154, pushing back into positive territory for the year, though still well below its peak of 9,338.

The federal funds rate hasn't changed since March 1997, when policy makers nudged it a quarter-point higher out of concern that strong economic demand would ignite inflation. They haven't cut the rate since January 1996.

Though Fed policy makers haven't changed rates in a year and a half, their policy has remained biased in favor of raising rates through much of the period because of concern that labor shortages would lead to higher prices.

Three weeks ago at the University of California at Berkeley, Greenspan indicated the policy had moved in August to neutral, equally disposed to cut or raise rates.

"Since then, deteriorating foreign economies and their spillover to domestic markets have increased the possibility that the slowdown in the growth of the American economy will be more than sufficient to hold inflation in check," he said.

Global financial turmoil has hurt the economy by reducing U.S. export sales and pinching the profits of exporting companies.

Overheard: "Hmm... I missed that really cool article in yesterday's Collegian. My life is incomplete. What, oh what, can I do," said Fred Freshman?

Suddenly, the voice of Fred's nifty Collegian guardian angel replied: "Fear no more," said the little man. "All you need is internet access and recollection of the address listed below... Now your life is hunky-dorey."

Family upset by drug speculation

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — The sudden death of Olympic gold medalist Florence Griffith Joyner renewed speculation that she might have used performance-enhancing drugs, speculation that has angered and upset her family.

"How would you feel if someone was spreading false rumors about you, and your daughter had to read about this?" Bob Kersee, Griffith Joyner's former coach, said Tuesday. Griffith Joyner was the mother of a 7-year-old girl.

Griffith Joyner, who blazed her way into national attention with her world-record speed, flashy bodysuits and glittering 6-inch fingernails, died early Monday in her sleep at age 38.

An autopsy was continuing. Greg Foster, a three-time world champion in the 110-meter hurdles, said he was told by Griffith Joyner's family that she died of a heart problem.

Known to fans as FloJo, Griffith Joyner won gold medals in the 100 and 200-meter dashes and the 400-meter relay at the 1988 Seoul Olympics and at her death still was the fastest woman sprinter ever.

Although she never failed a drug test, accusations that Griffith Joyner used performance-enhancing drugs had been leveled in the past. Her sudden death renewed such talk.

In Belgium, the chairman of the International Olympic Committee's medical commission said Wednesday that Griffith Joyner was subjected to rigorous examination at the 1988 Games and passed every test.

"So there should not be the slightest suspicion," the chairman, Prince Alexandre de Merode, said. "Let her rest in peace. The issue is closed."

Her sister-in-law, Olympic gold medalist Jackie Joyner-Kersee, urged everyone to wait for the autopsy findings and said it was inappropriate to speculate.

Bob Kersee also disputed reports that Griffith Joyner had a history of heart trouble. He did say she suffered from exercise-induced asthma and migraine headaches.

"In terms of heart seizures, heart attacks, all of that — none of that is true," he said. "

We, unfortunately, have no idea why Florence left us."

Commenting on a seizure that Griffith Joyner had two years ago, Kersee said she was hospitalized overnight in St. Louis, but that doctors could not find anything wrong and released her.

The day before she died, Griffith Joyner made an appearance at a gymnastics meet in Santa Barbara, Calif., and visited her mother. When she returned home, she felt "a little tired" and went to sleep, Kersee said.

There were "no signs whatsoever that Florence was ill," Kersee said.

Growers disagree with early estimates

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — Early government estimates of a record corn harvest in Kansas might be unrealistic, with harvested fields bringing in much less than anticipated, corn producers say.

"A lot of growers are saying they are not seeing those kind of optimistic yields coming out of their fields, and they are not seeing it come out of the fields of people they talk to," said Jere White, executive director of the Kansas Corn Growers Association.

Actual yields are down throughout the Corn Belt, including big corn-producing states like Iowa, Illinois and Indiana, White said.

In its September outlook, Kansas Agricultural Statistics forecast corn yield at 407.6 million bushels, up from the 1997 record of 386.1 million bushels. Farmers should harvest 2.85 million acres of corn with average yields of 143 bushels an acre, KAS said.

"It is a common talking point when growers get together that they are not seeing where these numbers could possibly be coming from," White said.

State statistician Eldon Thiessen said those crop estimates are based on surveys of growers done in late August and early September. Only 27 percent of the crop was mature when that report was made.

"It is true, back then, not all producers would have had an opportunity to go out and actually harvest some of their fields," Thiessen said. "They may have been giving us projections of what they thought it would be."

In Kansas, the agency does an objective inspection of fields when issuing wheat forecasts. But it bases crop projections for corn, sorghum and soybeans on producer surveys alone, Thiessen said.

Nebraska, Iowa and Illinois also make objective yield surveys, said Thiessen, who also said Kansas does not fund his agency to do on-site surveys for any crops other than wheat.

About 30 percent of the corn harvest is complete in southwestern Kansas. Growers in Kansas are moving into sorghum harvest. The northwest area of the state is starting to harvest dryland corn, and most of the harvest there is not expected to begin until next week, White said.

Drought in the southern part of the state probably reduced potential yields by 20 bushels an acre or more, he said.

Not enough grain sorghum has been harvested yet in Kansas to get actual results, White said.

Capitol shooting suspect appears in court

BY ANNE GEARAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The man accused of killing two police guards at the Capitol looked anxiously to his lawyer for help Wednesday as a judge asked him such questions as his name and address.

Russell E. Weston Jr., bandaged and appearing frightened, was pushed into a federal courtroom in a wheelchair for his first appearance before a judge since the July 24 shootings to answer one federal murder charge, covering the deaths of both officers.

He did not enter a plea, although he could have done so, and neither his lawyers nor prosecutors raised the potentially central issue of Weston's mental status. The defendant said he understood the charge against him.

Weston's lawyers, expected eventually to raise an insanity defense, would not discuss that strategy after Weston's brief appearance in U.S. District Court.

Weston, 41, was shot several times by police. He has been hospitalized since the shootings and was physically unable to appear in court before Wednesday, his lawyers said. Federal defendants typically appear in court within a day or two of their arrests.

Weston, whose family lives in Valmeyer, Ill., remains under guard in a locked ward at D.C. General Hospital, where he has weathered at least five surgical operations. He cannot walk yet, defense lawyer A.J. Kramer said.

A team of defense psychiatrists is authorized to visit Weston, and their evaluations likely would form the basis for any insanity claim. Prosecutors have lined up their own doctors, but those experts are not yet allowed to visit Weston.

Bandages peeked from a sleeve and pants leg of Weston's orange jail uniform. The uniform hung on Weston's hunched shoulders as he turned to Kramer for help answering the judge's first question: "What is your name?"

Weston appeared to gain confidence as the six-minute hearing continued. He told U.S. Magistrate John M. Facciola he understands the charge and his rights to a lawyer and to a preliminary hearing.

Asked his address, Weston again looked at his lawyer before replying: "At the Washington, D.C., hospital."

Kramer told reporters to draw their own conclusions about Weston's demeanor.

"He just looked at me to try to understand," Kramer said.

Weston was diagnosed years ago as a paranoid schizophrenic. He wrote frequent letters to government agencies, complaining about grievances such as his belief that land mines were planted on the grounds of his Montana cabin, court papers show. He once drove up to the guard hut outside the CIA and delivered a rambling discourse on President Clinton, Marilyn Monroe and cloning, the papers said.

Prosecutors have offered no suspected motive for the shootings, which began when a gunman burst through a metal detector at a Capitol door.

A grand jury is investigating the case and could indict Weston at any time, perhaps before his next scheduled court appearance Oct. 14. Court sources said that is likely.

adviser, Mark Tremaine, said a group member met Cunningham in Wichita during the summer.

The group notified campus officials of the upcoming protest a day after it filed its papers with the university, but it didn't tip officials to how graphic the display would be, chancellor's assistant Jeff Weinberg said.

"The hurt it is causing is unacceptable," Weinberg said Wednesday. "Can you imagine being a young woman on campus who may have gone through this to be told, 'You're no better than the Nazis?'"

Simone Fischer, 20, a student from San Antonio, said her first impulse was to tear down the signs when she saw the swastika and a photo of Holocaust victims headlined "Religious Choice" next to abortion photos headlined "Reproductive Choice."

"Being the Jewish new year, one of the most sacred days, and I see abortion being compared to Jewish graves and the Holocaust, I did not feel welcome on my own campus," Fischer said. "My feeling was shock and then anger. I felt violated."

University police Sgt. Troy Mailen said one student was so angered by the display that went up Sunday on the lawn of a dormitory that he drove his car into the display, nearly hitting a young woman with the group.

A second altercation happened Tuesday when a student attempted to knock one of the signs over and ended up punching the man holding it, Mailen said.

Fischer, representing the Jewish student group Hillel, and other student leaders took their frustration to university officials Tuesday. Other groups included the Black Student Union, Ecumenical Christian Ministries and the Pro-Choice Coalition.

Jonathan Macklin, of the Black Student Union, called the use of the lynching image irresponsible and said it trivialized a terrible time in the country's history.

Cunningham defended the use of the comparison, saying it was the same shock technique a professor would use to teach about the Vietnam War or the Holocaust.

portion of its funding from the city. The Chamber plays a key role in the business growth of Manhattan, Klimek said.

When new businesses and chain stores are looking for a location, they often send out scouts. The Chamber is where businesses go for information about the city and its economy.

"Businesses look for a strong Chamber of Commerce," Klimek said. "Their success is really success for all of us in the city."

Gary Bedenharn, owner of On The Wildside in Aggieville, became a member of the Chamber about a year ago. He said the Chamber deserved the recognition.

"I feel they're really getting involved in the community," Bedenharn said.

The Chamber is doing a grand opening for his wife Lynne's new business, Kidz World, on Poyntz Avenue.

"They called us, which is good because some of us businesses don't know what they offer," Bedenharn said.

Colantone said he attributes the success of the Chamber to all the volunteers and member businesses who are active in the organization.

They help to promote and carry out the programs and services upon which the award is based.

employees and senators to achieve their goals, Glasscock said.

"Employees across the state have got to become more active," he said. "They must work to get others to become part of the solution."

Classified senators have plans in place to let their views be heard, said Connie Kissee, executive board representative.

"We have plans to go to Topeka in late October to talk to the senate. The more employees we have, the better the outcome will be," Kissee said.

"We have never been vocal, and we decided that's what we're going to be from now on."

Of 26,052 classified employee positions in Kansas, almost 2,500 are at K-State, Grice said.

REGENTS SCHOOLS

BY SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State leads Kansas Board of Regents schools this year in admissions growth, according to a report released Thursday by the board.

The report lists K-State with a 3 percent increase in student enrollment from last fall, for a total enrollment of 20,885.

K-State had the largest increases in resident admissions and on-campus enrollments. The regents system posted the largest enrollment since 1984 at 80,361 students.

Ron Downey, associate provost of planning and analysis, said the report reflects a positive trend for Kansas colleges in general.

"The thing that ought to be really apparent is that nobody went down, with the exception of Fort Hays State University," Downey said.

According to the report, FHSU had an enrollment drop of 215 students from last fall, a 3.8-percent decrease.

With a growing high school population extending into the millennium, Downey said the state's demographic shows a larger percent of Kansas high school graduates are going to college.

Getting the majority of those students has been a matter of both keeping K-State's percentage of high school recruits moving up with the class sizes and collecting new scholarship funds to attract more, he said.

K-State enrolled 323 students ranked first or second in their high school graduating classes, breaking its record of 272 last year.

"Historically, we've made additional efforts to recruit valedictorians and salutatorians across the state. This is not a new effort," Downey said.

The combination of a strong curriculum and scholarship opportunities has made that tradition possible, Downey said.

"It takes all those factors to be present," he said.

"We've got the complete package."

Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, said K-State had been in a zero-growth phase until the campus was updated for a larger population.

"Those things have enabled us to accommodate growth. We pride ourselves, really, as the college of choice among Kansans," Krause said.

Krause said he sees continual and modest growth in the future as the university paces itself.

Comparably sized schools such as the University of Kansas (25,155) and Wichita State University (14,773) had increases of .2 and .7 percent, respectively.

Tom Hutton, director of university relations for the University of Kansas, said KU's growth of .2 percent was exactly what his school had wanted.

"That's really the University of Kansas' goal — a level enrollment. We're at the size we want to be," Hutton said.

SALINA, Kan. — K-State-Salina's enrollment has increased nearly 22 percent over last year, according to a report issued by the Kansas Board of Regents on Thursday. The increase brings problems to K-State-Salina that are already familiar to those on the Manhattan campus.

The lack of parking spaces is now an issue for the campus, said Matt Melvin, assistant dean and director of college advancement.

"People can't leave for lunch, because they won't be able to find a parking place when they

Enrollment figures up but still behind Wefald's 1995 predictions

THE FUTURE

With the release of 1998 total enrollment figures on Thursday, the number of students at K-State has exceeded its 1994 level.

In President Jon Wefald's university address of September 1995, he said the university expected to see enrollment increase as much as 19 percent over the next 5 to 7 years. K-State has not met that prediction in 1998, with a 2-percent enrollment increase over 1997 figures.

This year's increase is up only 1 percent from 1994's figures.

In 1994, total enrollment was 20,664 students compared to 1998's total enrollment of 20,885.

Wefald said Thursday that earlier predictions were based more on Kansas high school graduating classes and the percentage of those graduates who generally attended K-State. However, he said the peak in total enrollment will probably occur in 2004 and 2005.

"It's not a science. You never know," Wefald said, referring to enrollment predictions.

WEFALD

K-State bases its enrollment predictions on Kansas high school enrollment rates. For freshmen entering college in 2002, K-State administrators look at 1998's freshman class for enrollment figures. Now, 87 percent of K-State students come from Kansas schools.

College enrollment predictions and totals fluctuate due to a number of influences, but most administrators indicate increased scholarships as the primary explanation for this year's 2-percent increase over 1997.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said the period following 1996 was the first decline in student enrollment in recent years. Bosco said K-State, in 1996, was below market share, meaning enrollment was below the average percentage of Kansas high school graduates who normally attend K-State.

"That was a period of time when our scholarships were no longer competitive," Bosco said. "That gave us the impetus to ask our alumni through the KSU Foundation to start a major scholarship campaign."

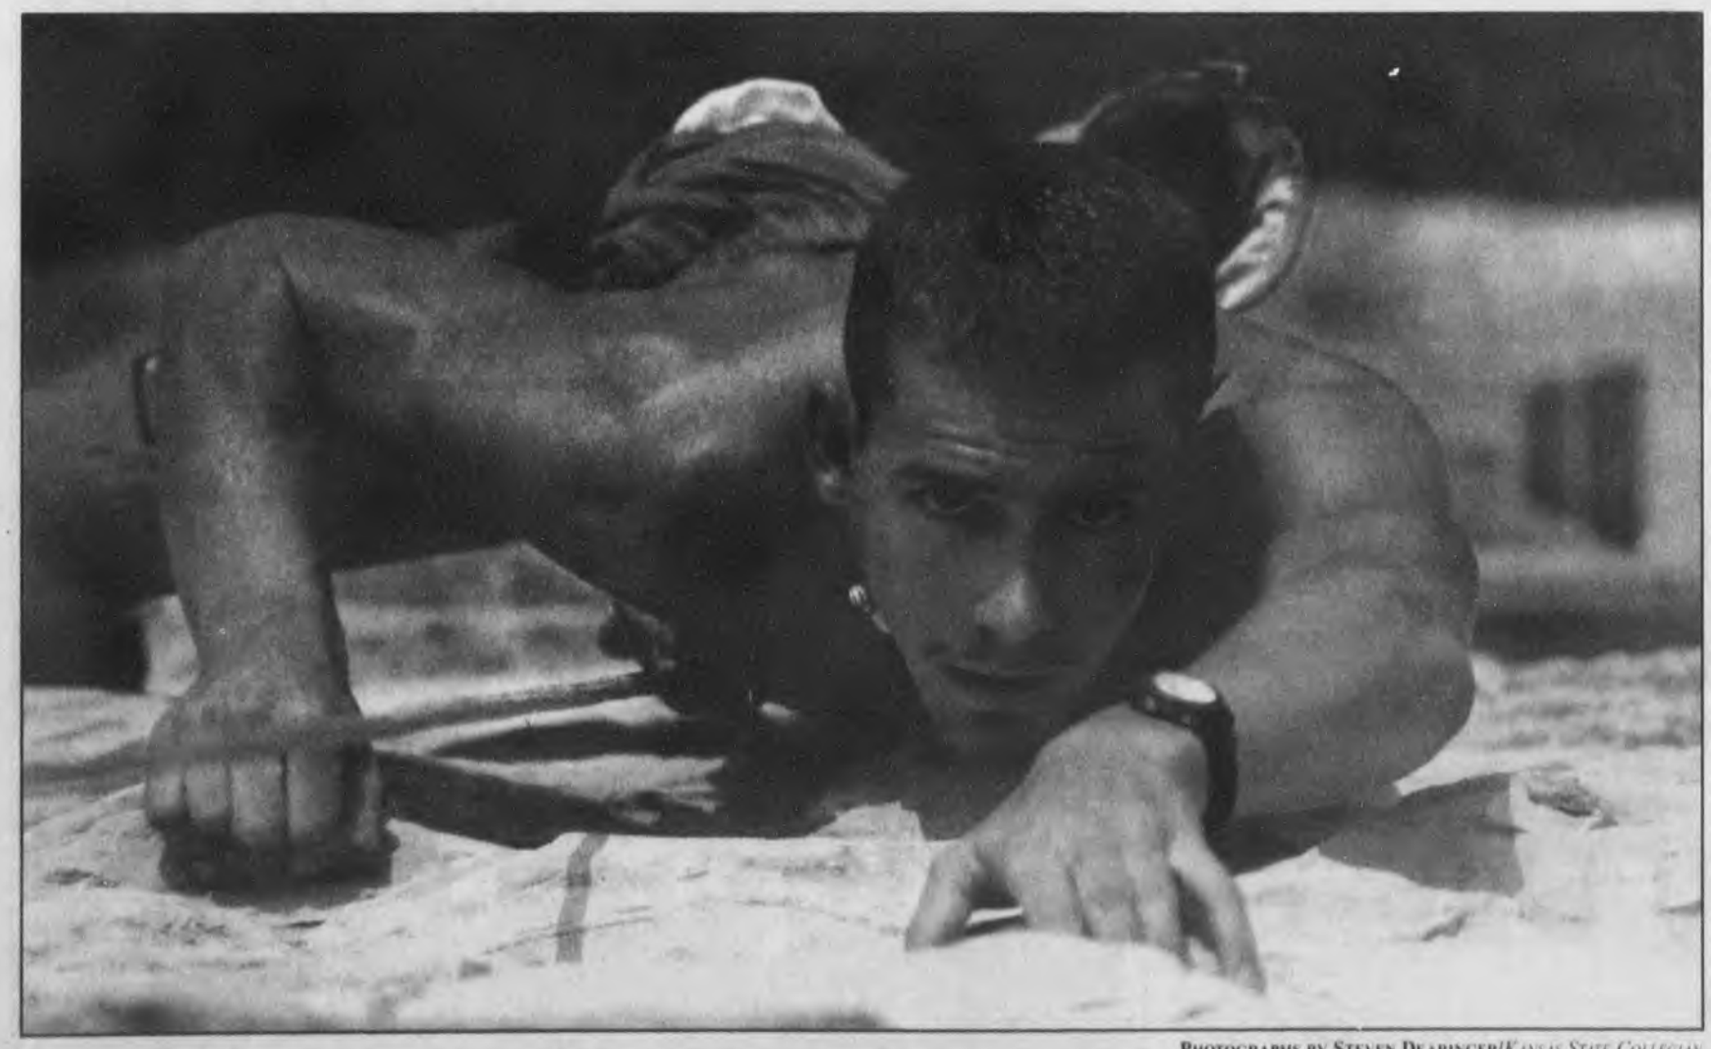
That campaign, which officially began Sept. 18, has so far netted nearly $27 million. It is seen by some as a way to compete with the scholarship-rich University of Kansas. But it was a $1 million advance to the scholarship committee in the fall of 1996 that managed to stave off a significant decline in enrollment in 1997 and 1998.

"We could have waited, but we would have missed the fall class of 1997, 1998 and 1999 — and that was not acceptable," Bosco said.

Administrators generally suggest 23,000 students is an attainable goal for K-State by 2004 or 2005.

Bosco said he expects at least 2,000 more students in the next five to seven years.

"We think we can manage that with our present facilities and classroom management," he said.



With the passage of tuition accountability a

Florida braces for hurricane

BY TRACY FIELDS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KEY WEST, Fla. — Leaving nearly 200 people dead in its wake, Hurricane Georges stormed toward the Florida Keys with gathering speed Thursday, and three-quarters of a million people along the coast were warned to clear out.

Forecasters said Georges probably would slice through the Keys — the curving, whisker-like string of islands off the tip of Florida — with 105 mph winds early this morning and could be up to 125 mph by Sunday in the northern Gulf of Mexico.

"This storm looks like it's all set to explosively intensify once the eye gets over water," said Jerry Jarrell, director of the National Hurricane Center in Miami. He urged stragglers in the Keys to get out.

The first squall line from the hurricane moved into Marathon in the middle Keys shortly before sunset, spawning a waterspout.

As many as 690,000 people were urged to evacuate along Florida's Atlantic Coast as far north as Fort Lauderdale, and along the Gulf Coast up to the Tampa Bay area, for a total of about 300 miles of coastline.

Senators hope booth will help accessibility

BY NICK BRATKOVIC

In the near future, student senators will be more accessible to students.

Senate voted 25-22 Thursday night to pass a bill requiring all senators to work one hour bimonthly at a question-and-answer booth in the K-State Student Union. The booth will be designed to answer any questions students might have regarding Senate.

The bill, which was hotly contested, was proposed by Senate Communications Committee Chair Mary Bosco and her committee as a way to increase awareness in student government and find out what issues K-State students want to be addressed.

"The goal is to go out and show students that we care," Bosco said.

Robin Cates, human ecology senator, said she agreed with Bosco and the hour of time was a necessity, even though it would take an extra time commitment from senators.

20-year-old arrested for burglary, theft

A suspect has been arrested in connection with the gun that Jason E. Brinkeroff, 15, a sophomore at Manhattan High School, took to school last week.

Pottawatomie County Sheriff's Department Detective Shane Jager said James Dorr, 20, was arrested Tuesday for burglary and theft after allegedly stealing the gun from a car at the Rocky Ford Fishing Area.

Jager said Brinkeroff, who is Dorr's brother-in-law, intended to sell the gun at MHS but was caught with the 9 mm pistol and ammunition clip before a sale was made.

Information about Dorr's bond and possible court date could not be obtained at press time. Brinkeroff faces the Manhattan/Ogden U.S.D. 383 Board of Education today in a hearing to determine whether and for how long he will be expelled. He is suspended from school.

Manhattan High School officials directed all questions Thursday night to Principal Sylvester Benson, who could not be reached for comment.

K-State homepage changes each visit

Regular visitors to the K-State homepage might have noticed something unusual lately: the picture at the top changes with every visit.

The page is randomly displaying one of eight specially selected photographs, which change each time the page is loaded.

The new feature was implemented to improve the homepage and to let people see more of K-State.

"It's a way to snazz up the page a bit and let people see different scenery on campus," said Harvard Townsend, Computing and Network Services interim director.

The Webmaster Committee selected the photographs, some of which were brand new and some of which were older.

The picture of Anderson Hall dates back several decades, said Elizabeth Unger, vice provost for academic services and technology.

"The pictures had to be representative of things at K-State that we wanted to display publicly, and they needed to have their original fidelity," she said. "They're simply to make the page more interesting and give prospective students a chance to see different parts of K-State."

People can click on the picture to see an enlargement and a gallery of the eight pictures.

From there they can click on a link leading to K-State Photographic Services, which sells the photos.

Unger said more pictures might be added to the page in the future.

"The Webmaster Committee thinks it might be a good idea," she said.

Visitors to the site can leave comments about the new photographs or other aspects of the site.

"We're always interested in input," Unger said.

Discussion underway to unite 2 colleges

PRATT, Kan. — Preliminary talks are underway to unite Pratt Community College and Area Vocational School and Fort Hays State University, although the two schools are more than 100 miles apart.

The community college made the first overture to the four-year university in Hays in what would be a precedent-setting union in Kansas.

Pratt's President William Wojciechowski said Wednesday that the talks are preliminary, and the issue is not on a fast track. Similarly, a news release issued by Fort Hays described the merger talks as "exploratory discussions."

The Legislature must sanction the linkage of the two institutions. A bill to change the governance and financing of community colleges arose in the 1998 Legislature but did not gain approval.

Home counties provide substantial funding for community colleges. The property tax mill levy in Pratt County to support Pratt Community College is the highest in the state — 38.8 mills — and the college board does not want to increase it.

"The state hasn't been generous with community college funding," Wojciechowski said, so that compels the college to rely on student enrollment to provide income.

A draft document prepared by representatives of both Fort Hays and Pratt outlines what could happen if the schools unite, to include the following:

■ The Pratt school would be known as the Pratt County Campus of Fort Hays State University. Although a four-year degree could be obtained at Pratt, Fort Hays would emphasize its bachelor's and master's programs, and Pratt would emphasize associate and vocational technical programs.

■ Pratt and Fort Hays would continue their separate athletic programs.

■ Pratt would continue to have a board of trustees to oversee some operations, including control of the physical infrastructure in Pratt.

■ Pratt County taxpayers would see their taxes for the college drop to about 21 mills, and students would see their tuition rise over a five-year period to align with Fort Hays' fees.

Fourth-grader gives LSD to classmates

LOS ANGELES — The little girl suddenly began laughing loudly to herself, disrupting her fourth-grade journal-writing lesson. Her teacher asked her to begin writing, but all she could do was scribble.

It wasn't a case of the giggles. Authorities said she brought LSD-tainted liquid breath freshener and passed it out to fellow students.

Soon, the 9- and 10-year-old students were showing symptoms ranging from dizziness to nausea and hallucinations.

"It was put into a commercially sold breath mint, Ice Drops, a small vial with about one milliliter of liquid in it at the time we got it," Lt. Rick Papke said.

Some were hospitalized, but all had been released Thursday. Detectives found traces of LSD in three children but none of the illicit drug in the systems of the other 10, police said.

"They were completely disoriented, acting irrationally," Papke said.

Hundreds of parents met with administrators at the San Fernando Valley school Thursday morning to hear what officials knew of the incident.

"You must remind your children never touch anything dangerous or unusual," Principal Loraine Mason told the group.

Mason said authorities believe the fourth-grade girl found the doped breath-mint vial on the way to school, but the matter was under police investigation.

In a strange twist, the class where children passed the drug had been scheduled to receive an anti-drug lesson Thursday.

Los Angeles school students are instructed in the DARE anti-drug program from fifth grade on, but police officers sporadically drop in on younger classes with lessons and cautions against drugs.

Lack of car insurance may result in penalty

TOPEKA — Life could become a little tougher on the estimated 180,000 Kansas motorists who violate the law by driving without automobile insurance.

Insurance Commissioner Kathleen Sebelius wants lawmakers next year to increase penalties for getting a driver's license reinstated after it has been suspended for failure to have insurance.

"Under the current law, it is cheaper to pay the $25 penalty than to purchase the insurance," she told reporters Tuesday.

The commissioner said she didn't know how much the increase would be. She said her staff is working on a recommended increase to present legislators.

Sebelius said 10 percent of the state's 1.8 million licensed drivers are uninsured, and Kansas drivers have the eighth-lowest insurance rates in the nation.

Arts, Sciences dean wanted change after teaching math

BY AMANDA LEVIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Editor's Note: This is the final installment of the Collegian's "Meet Your Dean" series.

NICHOLLS

The land of opportunity brought Peter Nicholls, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, all the way from England to the campus of K-State.

"I came to the United States because of the exciting research happening in mathematics, and there are more universities here than in England," Nicholls said.

Nicholls was born and raised in Kent, England. He attended the University of London as an undergraduate and Cambridge University as a graduate, majoring in mathematics.

Nicholls' first stop in the United States was not at K-State but was as a professor of mathematics at Northern Illinois University.

After teaching there for 20 years, Nicholls decided it was time for a change in his career and location.

"I wanted to get into administration work," Nicholls said. "It is a change from teaching full time, but I enjoy the work."

Nicholls spends most of his time managing the college's $43 million budget. He decides which departments the money should go to, what equipment to purchase and how personnel positions should be filled.

The College of Arts and Sciences is the largest college on campus, with a wide range of disciplines, from aerospace studies to women's studies. Because the college is so broad-based, Nicholls has four associate deans who help in specific areas.

"Nicholls is very personable," Associate Dean Jerry Reeck said. "He treats everyone fairly and works to promote academic integrity."

Nicholls said he tries to teach a mathematics class at least once a year to help keep in contact with the students. He rarely has the chance to meet with students, but said he is always open to speaking with them and helping them in their pursuit of academic excellence.

"The students are why we are all here, and I try to teach at least once a year so I don't forget it," Nicholls said.

Nicholls said the college is focusing on renovating departments and creating a better learning experience.

"We are really focusing on the buildings and facilities this year," he said. "Technology is advancing so fast, and we are trying to keep up for the benefit of the students."

OUR OPINION
The Collegian editorial board says meeting your dean can benefit any student.
See Page 4.

Nicholls said the construction of a new biology facility is an excellent example of the advancements for which he and college faculty are striving.

"The major project right now is the building of a facility for the biochemistry, biology and center for cancer research," Nicholls said.

"This project should be going up in the next three years and create a snowball effect for other departments to benefit from."

Man confesses to 1979 strangling of Kansas woman, faces jail time

BY LIBBY QUAID
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The strangled woman in Shawnee, Kan., was nearly two decades and 1,100 miles behind Daniel Leroy Crocker.

Crocker married and he had two children. He managed a warehouse. All the while, no one connected him to the 1979 murder of Tracy Fresquez, a recent high school graduate who was engaged to be married. Authorities said they would never have made the connection.

Finally, the weight on his heart and on his mind grew unbearable. Crocker, now 38, sought out a minister, confessed to the killing, and got a one-way ticket to face the consequences.

"He's always been in a Christian family," said the Rev. Al Lawrence, the clergyman who helped arrange for Crocker to turn himself in.

"He strayed during those years. He walked away. He got involved in drugs. Then he went back to that real strong Christian community, found his wife and married her, and lived in those traditions, fighting all the time not to be reminded."

At Crocker's behest, Lawrence called Johnson County, Kan., authorities. On Tuesday, Crocker flew to Kansas City to turn himself in.

OUR VIEW

Knowing deans can improve education

You should be paying attention.

Over the course of the past two weeks, the Collegian has been letting you know who is in charge.

Every day, we have featured a different dean from each of K-State's 10 colleges in an attempt to help you know more about the people who ultimately are shaping your learning environment. By knowing your dean and understanding his or her philosophy on teaching, learning, research and students, you can have a better understanding of how to improve your own education and fit into your school's disposition.

Although all of the deans on campus maintain an open-door policy, time constraints naturally make it prohibitive for each of them to spend time with every student. It is unfortunate that the only time many students meet their deans is when they are having academic problems of some sort, and their professors cannot help them.

In college, practicing good communication skills is essential for success. Although making an appointment to introduce yourself to your dean personally is a bit excessive, there is much to be said for introducing yourself to your instructors. It is much easier for you to make the effort to meet your four instructors than it is for your four instructors to meet 200 of you.

K-State faculty are notoriously good at being accessible and ready to help, talk or answer questions. The history of openness between faculty, students and administrators at K-State begs for you to make an effort to become more involved in your education. It's part of the reason why we win so many prestigious national scholarships: the Goldwaters, the Trumans, the Marshalls and the Rhodes.

With enrollment on the rise, now is the time to make yourself more than a face. Let your teachers know that a living, breathing student is behind the name and social security number. It's not brownnosing; it's learning.

Schedule arranges classes; speech instructor not happy

Editor,

In addition to historically weak salaries and the recent irrational use of the wait list, K-State has cooked up yet another method of tormenting faculty. The university has implemented what it calls Schedule Twenty-Five, a trendy method of electronically arranging classes. Currently, we rely on a system of human ingenuity that negotiates subtle nuances of faculty preference with available and historic use of teaching space. It might not be efficient, but it's user friendly.

Having just been confronted by Schedule Twenty-Five's first attempt at assigning teaching space for the spring 1999 semester, I was more than annoyed to discover this pot-luck system placed me in three very different rooms for Public Speaking II, only one of which was tolerable for the course, a room I've taught in many times. The two unsatisfactory classrooms were in East Stadium; one was a tiny room, one-third the size of rooms I normally teach in, with twenty-four chairs crammed in (the exact number that may be enrolled in the course). The other, though larger, is windowless. Did I mention my proclivity to claustrophobia? Years ago, I taught in one of those East Stadium, cinder-blocked, windowless prison-like isolation cells, and as we were leaving, the doorknob fell off and twenty-five of us were trapped in that room for another forty minutes until someone heard the commotion and opened the door from the outside.

The one barely adequate classroom is one of three I'm usually assigned in Military Science. The Military Science classrooms are sufficiently large to accommodate my classes of twenty-four students, however, the building was constructed in 1943, and fifty-five years later, it still has the original creaky-cranky energy dog windows. On hot days, the large window air-conditioning units drown out normal conversation, so they have to be turned off. On cold days, room temperature varies by fifteen degrees, depending on how close one sits to the windows and how penetrating the north wind might be. It's adequate if that's the best I can get, the best K-State can provide.

So, I've learned not to expect too much and to rely mostly on my own creativity as a teacher. A piece of chalk and a quiet room is all I ask. Keep the Powerpoint; a piece of chalk will do. Our department does have two VCR units to accommodate a faculty of twenty-five, but both are under heavy demand, often in need of repair, and neither are allowed out of the building. To be fair, some years ago my department did spring for a $15 easel for me for visual-aid displays in my classes, so perhaps I'm being petty.

Sufficient, adequately equipped classrooms have only recently received serious university attention, as compared to immediate action to construct luxury skyboxes, but then, teaching is not nearly as glamorous as football, though it is more central to the university's mission.

THE BIG PURCHASE

Buying new car leaves columnist in distress

Sweat is running down my brow. I have a sick feeling in my stomach. I am nervous. Very, very nervous.

What, you might be asking, could cause such mental stress? Did I just find out I am going to be a father? Am I getting married? Am I in jail?

Nope.

I am trying to buy a new car.

I went into this process thinking I was going to have a good time. I was getting to go pick out the car that I wanted. I could test drive anything I wanted. The auto-buying world was at my feet.

Wrong.

Before I finally purchased a car, I had been lied to, sworn at, accused of lying, treated like I was stupid and almost ripped off.

VIEWPOINT

JACOB PALENSKE

I made a few mistakes during my car-purchasing excursion. First off, I tried to buy a car in Manhattan. Bad idea. It seems cars here in the Little Apple are priced quite a bit higher than in other cities. They aren't worth any more, they are just priced higher.

Second, we are in a college town. Never, ever forget that anyone over the age of 30 thinks all college students, regardless of background and education, are poor and stupid. We have no money to spend, and we don't know anything about anything.

At one local dealer, I was making a deal on a car I really liked. The price was pretty good, but I know how much dealers make on used cars, and I wanted a little discount on the price before I committed to buy. I also had Bessie, my well-worn old automobile, to trade in on a newer model.

This dealer said my car was only worth around half of what the NADA book said it was. This dealer also said my credit union couldn't beat their finance rates, either. Imagine my surprise when I was quoted an 11.5% interest rate as opposed to the 6.5% I was getting at home.

But I am stupid, so I shouldn't have noticed.

Come to find out, had I told Mr. Car Dealer I had a down payment, the rate would have been "substantially lower." Mr. Car Dealer also informed me I was lying to him, because I didn't tell him up front about the down payment I had.

Mr. Car Dealer never asked. Remember, I also have no money.

I left the dealership so angry, I never wanted to go car shopping again.

Giving up on Manhattan, I drove to Topeka. Things were much better there. The prices were good, and dealers were flexible. They didn't treat me like crap, and they never lied to me. I could drive whatever I wanted, and they made no assumptions about what kind of car they thought I could afford.

By the end of Monday, I was the proud owner of a shiny new-to-me car. I resisted the urge to do doughnuts in the front lawn of the dealership that was less than friendly to me.

So, a few tips for car dealers in Manhattan.

College students are not stupid. That is why we are in college. We are also not all broke. Some of us work very hard and take classes at the same time. Many of us have some disposable income to spend on something like a better car. We are not all supported by our parents, and we hate being asked where they are every time we want some help on a car lot. We also know one other thing: Topeka is only an hour away, and dealers there like students.

Money well-spent on hearing author speak

This past Saturday I had the opportunity to meet one of my few living idols, but I didn't have an extra 50 bucks lying around.

So, I spent the other $10 I didn't have just to hear him speak.

And I got more than I paid for, despite remaining standing for his hour-long speech. I will now be able to tell my children and everyone I meet that I was able to see and hear one of America's greatest writers, Kurt Vonnegut, author of over 20 books as well as numerous short stories.

But numbers aren't important.

I give full credit to Vonnegut for renewing my faith in literature. I had given up on books in the tenth grade, because they were all too long and boring, and they focused too much on telling a story.

VIEWPOINT

TODD PACEY

After telling my English teacher I hated books, she told me to read Vonnegut.

So I found a copy of "Galapagos" and finished it almost immediately. I could not figure out why I enjoyed it, so I proceeded to read "Hocus Pocus" and "Slaughterhouse Five." I was hooked.

Saturday he explained this writing drug.

Using a graph to illustrate the different types of stories, Vonnegut explained Shakespeare's "Hamlet" which he called the greatest treasure to English literature.

The story begins at a point lower than normal and continues in a straight line of sub-par emotions.

Vonnegut said we are never told what is good news and what is bad news.

He concluded that Shakespeare was a bad storyteller, but at the same time, he wrote a masterpiece. The reason was because he told the truth. The audience or reader must decipher what is the good news and what is the bad news.

You can't just be entertained, you have to think, too.

This is what had me hooked on his books. Vonnegut tells the truth. He explained his books as "ordinary people trying to behave decently in indecent situations." Indirectly, Vonnegut turned me on to other authors similar to this style such as Milan Kundera, Jack Kerouac and Fyodor Dostoyevsky.

He is also blamed/given credit — you choose — for my writing.

The anti-climactic style and organized randomness has put me on a lifelong quest to emulate his writings. I do not ever expect to achieve his greatness nor do I want to write completely similar, but he has given me somewhere to begin.

Like Vonnegut, edited for the Collegian, I don't mess around.

I am a somewhat of a crass individual, because I speak my mind and tell the truth. I sound like I am miserable due to my indifference but nothing could be further from fact. I am filtering the good news as I see it, not how I am told.

My mission is to be amusing and confusing to myself and others.

Saturday I was both of these as I smiled for an hour listening to a man I hold in high regard tell everyday life stories, which he found amusing. Whether it was the mailbox, which he called "a giant blue bullfrog" or a young woman who sometimes wore black lipstick, who he was in love with, he confused us as to why we were never amused by these simple things.

"We are here on earth to fart around; don't let anyone tell you different," Vonnegut said.

I now shall end with something Kurt's uncle Alex used to say, something he encouraged all of us to pause and say every once and a while. We just need to stop, recognize where we are and say,"If this isn't nice, I don't know what is."

Thank Kurt Vonnegut for making this and all my ramblings possible.

Friends remember student who died in car wreck last Friday

GUEST COLUMN BY JOHN DOWELL

A friend is a person to laugh with, to depend on and to share the joys of life. We all depend on our friends, and they are invaluable to us. On the morning of Sept. 18, the students of K-State were stripped of a friend.

With tears working toward the front of my eyes and a hole in my stomach, I picked up the phone to call those who knew the deceased. I had to call those who were my friends, and those who had lost the friend. It was quite possibly the hardest thing I have ever done in my life.

Justin J. Robben was thrown from his vehicle the morning of Sept. 18 and was airlifted to St. Francis Hospital in Wichita. He was pronounced dead later that day. He is survived by his parents, Fran and Jim Robben; his sisters, Kimberly and Kelsey; and scores of friends and family. Being a close friend to him, I can fathom the pain that his family is going through. I know that there is an emptiness in the hearts of all his friends.

MEMORIAL SERVICE
Friends of Justin Robben, who died last weekend as a result of a car accident, have organized a memorial service for him at 7:30 tonight at St. Isidore's University Chapel, 711 Denison Ave.

Amos D. Ochs, Robben's roommate and close friend, was also in the vehicle when it left the road. Ochs was able to hold himself in the car and sustained several cuts to the face, arms and back. After the car had come to rest, Ochs pulled himself from the car and ran door to door at the nearby houses, searching for help. After many attempts at several houses, he finally was able to get help. Being a close friend of Ochs, I know that his pain goes much deeper than his stitches indicate.

The funeral for Robben was on the following Tuesday in Oakley, Kan. As visitors drove through town that day, they saw signs stating "Closed For Robben Funeral" and found only standing room at the church.

"That town is awesome," said Eli Drown, Robben's former roommate. "The place shut down — the whole town stopped working all day."

The church was filled with family and friends. Classmates from Oakley as well as students from K-State shared the grief of losing such a dear friend.

Dave Kuhlman and Tyler Engel were classmates of Robben's since they had been in kindergarten. Several close friends from out of town made the journey to Oakley to pay their respects as well. The Robben family was touched and even comforted by the large turnout of Justin's friends.

"His family ... they are great people. They didn't deserve to have something like this happen to them," Chris Youngers said.

My own mind was swarmed with twisted thoughts and gouging emotions. It was like trying to cough up a knife that was lodged within my chest. With each upheaval of tears, my chest felt a little bit looser, as if part of me was cut away. My face was numb to the tears that constantly ran down my face. As the service came to a close, I was able to pull myself together, only by realizing that I had to be strong for Justin's family and especially for our mutual friends. They were there for me, and I had to be there for them.

That was what it was about. We had all experienced a tragic loss this weekend, and everyone needed a shoulder to cry on. Some didn't cry out loud but just held it inside. Others couldn't control the tears, but either way, we held together. That's the way Justin would have wanted it.

"The pain comes and goes, one minute it's just another day, the next my face is in my hands, and I don't even attempt to hide the tears," Cory Lafferty said.

It was our friendship with Justin that caused our hurt, and it was our friendship with each other that kept us functioning.

As friends, it helped us to talk about our hurt and about how we missed Justin and the times we had shared. There were funny mishaps, crazy adventures and recollections of his amusing habits, like playing solitaire on the computer for hours on end.

He was a friendly kind of guy who was quiet, until you got him started — and then watch out. His stories could last up to an hour, with various pauses lasting 5 minutes.

"He could always uplift you with a good story or make you laugh when you needed it the most," Engel said.

"Not having him around is going to be hard. This fact has barely set in for myself, and others feel the same. I keep expecting to see him, or get a call from him or have him walk up to me between classes and say hi. He hasn't," Brienna Geurian said.

"There was no one who didn't like Justin," Anne Schreiber, Ochs girlfriend, said.

For myself and for many others, life just won't be the same. Part of us will be missing. As long as we keep our memories and our friendship, we will get by.

But that doesn't take the hurt away. Drown managed to convey the feelings of everyone who knew Robben in one simple sentence:

"I miss him like crazy."

Wildcats ready for final non-conference opponent

BY JOHN BERGGREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State heads back to the guillotine on Saturday to face Northeast Louisiana with a 45-point favor. Kickoff will be at 1:10 p.m. at KSU Stadium.

The Indians are 2-1, with both of their wins coming at the expense of I-AA opponents. Their one loss was a 42-12 blowout at No. 3 ranked Florida.

The Wildcats, on the other hand, are 3-0 after walking through all of their games this season, earning a No. 3 ranking in the ESPN/USA Today coaches' poll and No. 5 ranking in The Associated Press poll. K-State is averaging 62.3 points per game on offense, while giving up only 4.7 per game.

Though this game has all the indications of another Wildcat blowout, Northeast Louisiana does possess an aspect of football that K-State hasn't had to concentrate on so far this season. The Indians have had decent success throwing the ball.

NLU's quarterback-receiver tandem of redshirt freshman Andre Vige and senior slot end Marty Booker has connected 21 times this season for 389 yards and two touchdowns. Vige has thrown for three touchdowns on the season, while racking up 596 yards passing.

SNYDER

"They've got some speed at wide receiver and a talented quarterback that throws the ball pretty well," Coach Bill Snyder said.

"Their quarterback is young and was pretty effective in their first ball game and threw the ball for over 300 yards. As he gets further into the season, I'm going to labor under the assumption that he will improve his game with his lack of experience."

K-State had some trouble defending the passing attack of the Longhorns last Saturday, allowing Major Applewhite to throw for virtually all of Texas' offense. This week will provide a nice test for the K-State secondary, Snyder said.

"There's no panic about that whatsoever," Snyder said.

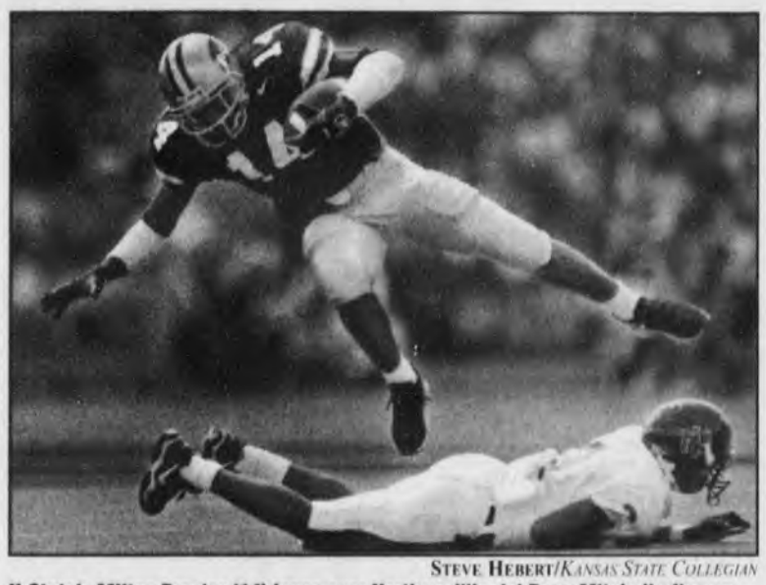
"There are some reasons why that took place last week. Some of those things we created ourselves, and we'll have to mend that.

"But it will be nice to put some of our focus on a passing team."

NLU's speed at the receiver position is also a bit of a concern for K-State. The Indians have played all of their games on grass thus far this season making it difficult to judge the quickness of the team, Snyder said.

"Playing on grass can sometimes create an illusion, and you can't always determine the speed of their team. We'll have to be careful about that, because they can appear slower on tape than they actually are," he said.

K-State does, however, have some interesting statistics on the line for the game:



The Wildcats bring an 11-game winning streak into the contest and a 42-game winning steak against non-ranked opponents.

Punt returner David Allen set a NCAA record last week by returning punts in three consecutive games. Allen needs just one more punt return to tie the NCAA record for punts returned in a season. That record is held by five players.

Eric Hickson comes into the game fifth on the all-time rushing list. Hickson has 375 career carries for 1,894 yards and 19 touchdowns. He is 372 yards from surpassing Mike Lawrence as the all-time leader.

K-State has outscored opponents 132-7 in the first half this season. The Wildcats scored 38 points in the first half against Indiana State, 59 points in the first half against Northern Illinois and led 35-0 at halftime last week against Texas.

A win against NLU will give Snyder his 70th win at K-State, equivalent to all the Wildcats' wins from 1964 to 1988.

Wildcats open Big 12 schedule against Sooners

BY BRENT STOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the Oklahoma Sooners take the floor against the Wildcats tonight for volleyball, there probably won't be revenge in the air.

Rest assured, the Cats know exactly who finished just ahead of them in the conference standings last year.

"Early in my career, I always got into that revenge stuff," Wildcat coach Jim McLaughlin said: "Then, I learned that as you keep getting better and keep improving, more wins come."

The Cats hope a win will come tonight in the Big 12 Conference opener as they are host to Oklahoma.

"They're going to be a powerful team," McLaughlin said. "They put up a pretty strong block on the left side, so we're going to have to move the ball around to keep them off balance," he said.

The Sooners jumped out to a 4-0, but then lost five matches in a row. They finally stopped that skid Saturday with a 3-0 win over Arkansas-Little Rock.

"This year, I feel that if we play well and they play well, we're the better team, and we'll beat them," McLaughlin said.

The Cats turn around Saturday and take on Kansas in the first of two Sunflower State Showdowns this year. The Jayhawks are out of the gates at 9-2, after winning their first six matches of the season.

The Hawks are led by middle blocker Amanda Reves. The 6-foot-1-inch junior is off to a good start, averaging 4.34 kills per game.

According to McLaughlin, one of K-State's top-four goals is never to lose to the rivals from down the road.

"That's what makes it great — the rivalries and the added incentive," McLaughlin said. "The bigger the bounty, the more fun it is."

Freshman Disney Bronnenberg said opening up the conference season at Ahearn Field House will be a big boost.

"It's very important," Bronnenberg said. "It's a big confidence-builder getting the home crowd here."

Both matches will start at 7 p.m. and can be heard on KSDB-FM 91.9.

BOAT DREAMS

CLIF PALMBERG/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State rowing team competes today at the Head of the Des Moines meet in Des Moines, Iowa. Other teams competing include Drake, the University of Kansas and Creighton.

Rowing team sets NCAA goals

BY SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The idea of waking up before sunrise every day would be enough to scare some people, but for the women of the K-State rowing team, it's part of the job.

The team said it hopes carrying out this part of the job will help it to meet goals that the it has never achieved.

The aim for this season is for all or part of the team to make it to the NCAA Championships this spring. Coach Jenny Hale said last year's team showed strength in attempting to achieve this goal but did not quite do so.

"I think they really showed a lot of poise in taking on that big of goal," Hale said. "We have enough depth on this team this year to maybe succeed."

The team will compete Friday at the Head of the Des Moines meet in Des Moines, Iowa. Hale said the meet will help give the team an idea of its boat speed in comparison to a team that has made it to the NCAA finals for the past two years.

"We have yet to beat them (Iowa) in two years of racing," Hale said. "That's a fairly big goal — to see if we can go out and beat the Iowa team. They've gone to the NCAAs the past two years, so if we can beat them, then we have a good chance."

Other competitors at Friday's meet will include Drake, Kansas, Creighton and several other universities. Hale also said some smaller schools that do not have varsity status will be at the meet.

The rowing team consists of two basic teams: novice and varsity. Members are novices for a year and then move to varsity.

Rebecca Riemer, a returning varsity member, said one of their goals is to provide support for the novices.

"Our goal is to bond with the new novices and make them feel comfortable in a sport that's new to everybody," Riemer said. "Just being their supporters and being somebody to look up to. That kind of bondage is what has built a strong team for KSU, because we've done that each year."

Riemer is one of three returning members of the four-person boat that nearly made it to the NCAAs last spring. Hale said this boat has a good chance of making the finals this year, but it's hard to tell so early in the season.

"It's always difficult to gauge at this time what your boat speed will be in the spring," Hale said. "We've got some challenges out there for us, but I think we've got quite a bit more depth for us."

While there is a great deal of time between now and the NCAA Championship, each rower is looking forward to it.

The goal for right now, however, is to try to beat Iowa at Friday's meet.

The team is looking forward to this season, and its members said they feel that with dedication, their goal is realistic.

"This year, we brought in some strong novices that became varsity. I think with them and with the program that Coach Hale has for us as far as workouts, we have a good chance of making it to the NCAAs," Riemer said.

Follow this train of thought and it will become clear: Air Force should be No. 1 in polls

VIEWPOINT
SAM FELSENFELD

If I had a vote in the sportswriters poll, my first-place selection would be Air Force. After all, defending national champion Michigan lost to Notre Dame, which lost to Michigan State, which lost to Colorado State, which lost to Air Force.

If Air Force wins the national championship, the team would be a sure bet to take a trip to Washington, D.C., to meet President Clinton. If that happens, I wonder who would fly the team plane. I also wonder whether the cheerleaders would go, too.

Maybe it sounds odd to think that Air Force could challenge for the national championship, but it sure does make a lot more sense than the way they have the top five set up right now. You know, that UCLA/Tennessee thing.

The whole strength-of-schedule argument is overrated. The No. 1 team should be the absolute best team, period — the team you would pick if you had to bet your life on one game. If living to see another day depended on one football team winning a game, I wonder how many voters would bow down to the Vols or Bruins.

Oh well. One top-ranked team is falling each week, and I just don't see the Cats losing to Northeast Louisiana on Saturday.

Anyway, here we go. I'm on a mission to prove I know a little something about football, because I've made some pretty good mistakes in the past. Each week, I'm picking 10 or so games against the spread and I'm going head-to-head with a guest picker.

MILLS, former Collegian sports editor

If I end up picking more games over the course of the season than my guest pickers, then I'll unofficially be qualified as someone who can pop off an opinion about the game. I will have proved that I'm doing at least a little better than the general public.

If I fail, I'll never write another football column in the Collegian. Of course, I'm graduating, so I'm over it. Through three weeks, I'm 22-11, while my guest pickers have combined to go 16-17.

This week's guest picker is former Collegian sports editor Sun Dee Mills. She graduated last year, and she's working in sports radio in Kansas City. Let me tell you — I don't think I've ever met a female who knows more about football than she.

Last year, the Collegian sports staff members put their picks in the paper on a weekly basis. The winner was supposed to have a dinner bought for them by the losing pickers. The two of us tied for first place at the end of the season, but there was never a dinner.

I guess this is the tiebreaker.

It's also a battle of the sexes, and I will represent well.

Anyway, the games we're picking are these (it's only nine this week after a hurricane wiped out the UCLA game against Miami).

1. Northeast Louisiana +45 at K-State. On the ol' PlayStation, once you play Texas and beat the Longhorns easily, the game against Northeast Louisiana is so easy it's ridiculous. In both seasons I've played, I've guided the Cats to victories of about 60 to 70 points. I play on the varsity level, so I know the score is fairly legitimate. My pick: K-State to cover. Guest: K-State to cover.

2. Northwestern +10 at Wisconsin. I don't know why I picked this game as one of my 10 for the week. Oh, now I remember: this one's a free pick to help raise my percentage. Northwestern stands about as much of a chance as I would in the ring against Mike Tyson. My pick: Wisconsin to cover. Guest: Wisconsin to cover.

3. Washington +13 at Nebraska. Both the Big 12 and PAC 10 will make a statement in this game. We'll find out which conference is for real and which conference is just hype. A Big Red rout could help the Cats in the battle against the Bruins, but a win by the visiting Huskies will take away from the magnitude of Nov. 14. My pick: Nebraska to cover. Guest pick: Nebraska to cover.

4. Rice +4 at Texas. The Longhorns aren't as bad as they looked last week. Ricky Williams will bust out against Rice, because if he doesn't, his Heisman chances will be slim to none. Following big losses to UCLA and K-State, this is bounceback week. My pick: Texas to cover. Guest pick: Texas to cover.

5. Texas Tech -6.5 at Iowa State. The Red Raiders will be the best team not going to a bowl this year. The Cyclones will be the worst team to beat Iowa this year. My pick: Texas Tech to cover. Guest pick: Texas Tech to cover.

6. Kansas -7.5 at Alabama-Birmingham. Rock chalk, chickenhawk, I hate KU. That's the non-profane version (newspaper rules). I don't care if it costs me my pick. My pick: UAB to cover. Guest pick: Kansas to cover.

7. USC +17 at Florida State. The Sporting News picked Florida State as its No. 1 preseason team. That's a worse jinx than being on the cover of Sports Illustrated. My pick: USC to cover. Guest pick: Florida State to cover.

8. North Texas +34 at Texas A&M. I don't care if D'Andre Hardeman is academically ineligible. It's North Texas we're talking about here. My pick: Texas A&M to cover. Guest pick: North Texas to cover.

9. David Allen's longest punt return: More than/less than 55 yards. I haven't seen any reason not to expect a big return. The blocking is there. The tackles are being broken. He's bringing one back from 78.

My pick: More than 55 yards. Guest pick: Less than 55 yards.

Think one of us is wrong? Send me your picks, and if you get them all right, I will proclaim your greatness to the world next week.

More of Starr's report to be released

■ Committee will decide on formal impeachment inquiry early next week.

BY DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The House Judiciary Committee will vote early next week on beginning a formal impeachment inquiry, committee chairman Henry Hyde said Thursday. He also said he had no reason to doubt the truthfulness of Monica Lewinsky's account of her relationship with President Clinton.

Hyde, the Illinois Republican presiding over the House review, also said the committee will release 60,000 more pages of Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's evidence next week.

Asked about the president's version of events, which conflicts on some points with that of the young former White House aide, Hyde replied, "We have his testimony and we have hers. And we'll read it, read both of them, and make our mind up as to who's the most believable and credible."

The comments at a news conference marked the first time Hyde had expressed a public opinion about any of the evidence amassed by Starr.

Hyde offered his observations at the same time he announced a timetable that calls for the panel to vote Oct. 5 or 6 on a formal inquiry of impeachment, and, assuming committee approval, the full House to vote by about Oct. 9

CLINTON

In addition, the committee will release much more of Starr's evidence, including grand-jury testimony by presidential secretary Betty Currie, Clinton's friend Vernon Jordan and Linda Tripp, who taped conversations with Lewinsky and alerted Starr to her relationship with Clinton.

Hyde made it clear the committee will not necessarily limit itself to the Lewinsky matter as it decides Clinton's fate.

"None of us are interested in casting a very wide net," he said. At the same time, he said that in addition to the material that Starr has submitted, or may submit in the future, "there may be other matters that we feel bear on the main question of the fitness of the president for this office. I would never say we won't hear those things."

House Speaker Newt Gingrich and others have suggested that any inquiry could expand into questionable fund-raising practices by Clinton and his campaign in the 1996 campaign.

Hyde made his comments as the White House, and congressional Democrats, continued to criticize Republican handling of the case.

Presidential spokesman Mike McCurry suggested Republicans might suffer a public backlash for dragging out proceedings that the public seems to want wrapped up quickly.

"There's not a great deal we can do with that (the timing). But I think the American people would then wonder why are we going to be forced to go through this issue, this discussion for what would obviously then be a matter of months with no attempt to resolve it, to put it behind us, to move on to deal with it," McCurry said.

Democrats on the Judiciary Committee criticized Republicans for saying they did not want to release audio tapes made by Tripp after insisting last week on releasing Clinton's videotaped grand-jury testimony.

The skirmishing of Republicans and Democrats was evident for all to see.

Less obvious was the internal Republican discontent.

Several lawmakers and aides, speaking on condition of anonymity, expressed the fear that Gingrich, himself the possessor of a controversial political profile, had become too visible a presence on the issue.

More broadly, they said they feared that since the run-up to the release of Clinton's grand jury tape on Monday, the White House and Democratic allies have been outmaneuvering the GOP in the daily public-relations battle.

Family Weekend tunes parents into college life

BY NICOLE TWIGG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Clean your room, fold your clothes and wake your roommate.

Mom and dad are in town.

Today kicks off this year's K-State Family Weekend.

Family Weekend gives K-State students, especially freshmen, a chance to show parents around campus and Manhattan and give them a sample of everyday college life. This is the second year that Family Weekend is being sponsored by the Union Program Council. It formerly was sponsored by the K-State Alumni Association.

Susan Hansen, assistant director of new student services, said Family Weekend helps parents learn about their students' lives at K-State.

"Family Weekend gives students a great opportunity to show their family members where they live now, the places they go and the things they do," Hansen said.

"The students can share their college experience with their family."

The event, formerly called Parents' Weekend, originally was scheduled during football season to increase support for the football team and to subsidize low ticket sales, Teto Henderson, UPC program adviser, said.

Now that tickets are in high demand, Family Weekend has expanded to include other sports, like volleyball. Families are invited to attend the Saturday match against the University of Kansas at 7 p.m.

Each year, Chimes Junior Honorary sponsors the "Family of the Year" essay contest. This year, Chimes received between 10 and 15 essays, which were screened by a committee of 10 Chimes members.

The winning Family of the Year essay was written by Kelli Ludlum, senior in animal science and industry, honoring her parents, Ann and Joe Ludlum from Uniontown, Kan.

"We will host a special luncheon Saturday morning to honor the Family of the Year and also Chimes' families," Chimes President Kris Meiergerd said.

Weekend highlights include the official kick-off pig roast dinner Friday night. On Saturday, families can get their pictures taken with Willie the Wildcat, and children can get their faces painted before the football game.

Families also might utilize K-State's Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and the Natatorium for free when students bring a valid K-State ID.

Several tours are available on and off campus, including the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, the Macdonald Laboratory, the College of Veterinary Medicine, the Historic Costume and Textiles Collection, Hale Library, and the Rose Garden and Conservatory.

The weekend is capped off with the Wildcat Scramble Golf Tournament on Sunday at 9 a.m. at the Stagg Hill Golf Course.

NATO threatens air strike unless attacks on Albanians end

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

VILAMOURA, Portugal — NATO instructed its generals Thursday to begin preparing for air strikes on Yugoslavia, unless President Slobodan Milosevic ends his attacks on ethnic Albanians in Kosovo.

The big question now: Will the tough Yugoslav president be intimidated?

The difference between this action and previous NATO tough talk is the tone and the timing, NATO officials said. A tough U.N. resolution Wednesday, combined with NATO's "activation warning" Thursday of phased air strikes and cruise missile attacks, takes the 16-nation alliance to the brink of shooting.

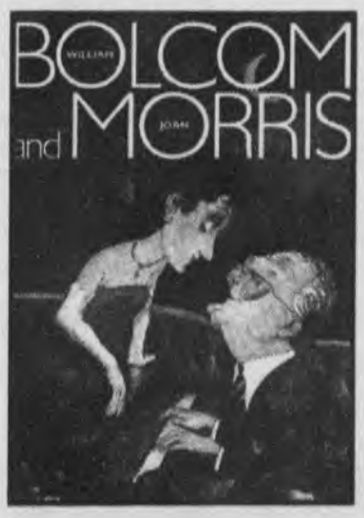
"Today, NATO sent a clear message to President Milosevic that it is time to stop the killing and destruction in Kosovo. Our patience is running out," U.S. Defense Secretary William Cohen said after a meeting of allied defense ministers.

NATO Secretary-General Javier Solana said the activation warning from the North Atlantic Council, NATO's top policy-making body, takes NATO to an increased level of military preparedness.

He said the use of force will require further decisions by NATO governments.

Milosevic's massive attacks on ethnic Albanian villages in Kosovo have continued unabated since February, despite previous NATO threats.

His seven-month crackdown on ethnic Albanian separatists fighting for independence in Kosovo has claimed hundreds of lives and forced as many as 275,000 people from their homes.



Previous threats of military action have failed to persuade Milosevic to mend his ways.

The latest saber-rattling from the alliance did not appear to have slowed his onslaught on Kosovo, a province of Serbia where ethnic Albanians make up 90 percent of the population.

FLECK, MARSHALL, MEYER ORDER YOUR TICKETS TODAY!

Three strong musical personalities join forces for a performance that will surprise and delight. Fleck is an avant-country banjo player, perhaps best known for his work with the Flecktones. Marshall plays a variety of instruments from the mandolin family and has performed with the David Grisman Quintet, Stephane Grappelli and Mark O' Connor. Meyer, a composer who's at home playing bluegrass and recording country music in Nashville. The concert features a winning mix of Bach, bluegrass, jazz, and world music, with a little R&B on the side.

Working with your spouse isn't always easy but the husband and wife team of William Bolcom and Joan Morris have done better than just prove it possible– proclaimed by the Boston Globe as "one of the great musical collaborations of our time." Their spirited performances have been captured on 18 albums and this year's tour takes them to New York, Boston, Toronto and Washington, D.C. Join them for such songs as "Fascinating Rhythm," "Someone to Watch Over Me," "More Than You Know," and "Great Day."

Cast makes show worth viewing

The Manhattan Center for the Arts is bringing Neil Simon's "Last of the Red Hot Lovers" to the stage.

Although the show is performed by an amateur cast, it's definitely worth catching — and there are three chances left: tonight, Saturday and Sunday in Grosh Performance Hall at the arts center.

This comedy, an instant hit when it first appeared on Broadway in the 1970s, was just as popular this past weekend when it opened for Manhattan audiences. The cast of four played to a packed house on Friday and continued to bring in crowds the rest of the weekend.

"Neil Simon is the quintessential entertainer," Charles Faulk, who plays Barney Cashman, said. "He has a real skill with one-liners."

Barney Cashman, played by Faulk, thinks he never has had any real excitement in his life. "I've never had a broken bone, or a temperature over 103," he rants during the first act. To add a little spice to his life, Barney decides to have a one-day affair. However, the women he chooses to fool around with aren't entirely what he expected.

"I kind of worry about being typecast," actress Schaneé Anderson said. "I've had a lot of parts where I play the floozy or the waitress who gets picked up."

In "Lovers," Anderson plays Elaine Navazio, the first of Barney's three lovers. However, her zest to get the job done takes Barney by surprise. Shelley Befort and Valerie Dykes, playing two other potential participants, Bobbi Michele and Jeanette Fisher, add more humor to the production as Barney tries desperately to have at least one special moment in his life.

Although acting is just a side project for the performers, their combined talent and the superb direction of Maggie Jackson lends this production a professional edge.

This group put together a worthwhile production in less than two months, which is no small feat for anyone involved in the theater.

Much of Simon's work is filled with lengthy monologues that tend to avert the audience's attention, but Faulk manages to make his sometimes-seedy Barney a compassionate character. As for the women of the production, it was a shame they were given only one act each to perform in; they deserved much more than the time allotted to them.

In its 43rd season of entertaining, Manhattan's own arts center proved it is worthy of a much larger audience than Grosh can accommodate. The Simon's fast-paced, intelligent humor was translated very well by these players, and they deserve a packed house tonight.

100th-birthday concert falls on perfect day to celebrate

Bolcom and Morris could not have picked a more perfect time to perform in Manhattan.

The husband-and-wife duet of William Bolcom and Joan Morris has endured for more than 20 years, but this pair is just getting warmed up.

The duet will perform at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium. The performance is titled "Nice Work If You Can Get It: Songs to Celebrate the 100th Birthday of George Gershwin and Vincent Youmans." Ironically, the performance falls on the exact day of songwriter Gershwin's 100th birthday, and the 100th birthday of Vincent Youmans, Gershwin's colleague and fellow songwriter, is Sunday.

David Frain, assistant director of McCain, said the performance couldn't have been scheduled at a better time.

"The program seems quite appropriate for Gershwin's 100th birthday," he said. "Bolcom and Morris are the best collaboration to showcase Gershwin's work."

With more than two decades of stage experience together, Bolcom and Morris are no strangers to musical performance. Bolcom, a pianist, received a Pulitzer Prize in 1988 for his "Twelve Etudes for Piano," while Morris, a mezzo-soprano, has appeared in several operatic performances, including "The Beggar's Opera." In addition, both Bolcom and Morris teach at the University of Michigan.

The performance also will feature pieces from Vincent Youmans, who was a friend of Gershwin. While Youmans was not as well known as Gershwin, he wrote some well known songs such as "More Than You Know" and "Tea For Two."

The performance will take place during K-State's annual Family Weekend.

"We hope everyone will take the opportunity to come and see Bolcom and Morris this weekend," Frain said.

Jennifer Nash, publications manager for McCain, said she hoped both students and their parents will take advantage of McCain's performances this semester.

"Students can show their parents what McCain has to offer," Nash said, "and since the performance falls on the centennial of Gershwin's birth, this is going to be a big event."

Nash said that when McCain Director Richard Martin was planning the 1998-99 McCain Performance Series, he scheduled Bolcom and Morris with the intention he would ask them to perform on Saturday.

"Since the performance is on Gershwin's birthday, we found it to be very appropriate," Nash said.

Tucker, Chan team together successfully in 'Rush Hour'

BY RYAN DOOM
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Movie Review
out of 5 stars

Two different cops from two different places are forced to work together to solve a tough case. "Rush Hour" is not exactly a new or original concept, but original is hard to find in today's Hollywood.

In this variation, Jackie Chan is a Hong Kong superagent who comes to America to rescue a Chinese diplomat's daughter. The FBI, which doesn't want Chan's help with its investigation, decides to assign someone to keep Chan out of the way. The FBI finds a wise-cracking, fast-talking Los Angeles detective, Chris Tucker, to become Chan's shadow.

"Rush Hour" is the first action/comedy in a long time that actually lives up to what it is supposed to be — an excellent blend of exciting action sequences and hilarious situations.

Anyone who has heard of these actors knows Chan is supposed to supply the action, while Tucker brings in his own brand of comedy. "Rush Hour" defies this and what it is meant to be — a run-of-the-mill "buddy" picture. The film actually allows both characters to be funny and show off their action skills.

The best part about the film is the chemistry between Chan and Tucker. Not many people could have foreseen what would happen when Asia's top superstar teamed up with the over-the-top loudmouth of the West. They are probably the best duo since Eddie Murphy and Nick Nolte teamed up in "48 Hours."

Another good aspect of the film is that the plot and overall acting are pretty good. Don't expect to see Tucker take home best actor Oscar at the Academy Awards, but it is a real improvement over his last picture, "Money Talks," with Charlie Sheen. This time, Tucker's timing seems to be just right — knowing when to be the court jester and when to act almost normal.

"Rush Hour" is not one of the year's best films. However, movies such as this aren't meant to be up there with "Chinatown" or "The Godfather." They are supposed to be fun and exciting; the leading stars are not supposed to make a dramatic appearance or exit. These kinds of films are meant to be exactly what "Rush Hour" is — a really entertaining movie.

come back," he said.

To combat the lack of parking places, an old building on campus is being torn down to make room for a new parking lot.

The increased enrollment accounts for some administrative changes undertaken by Provost Jim Coffman more than 16 months ago. The changes brought the Salina recruiting effort under the auspices of the Manhattan campus and Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco.

"In the past, to be candid, the Salina campus had and has a remarkable educational atmosphere and program, but we weren't effectively communicating the educational opportunities at the Salina campus," Bosco said. "So far, we've been moderately successful. We think we can be better."

Making room for cars is one thing, but making room for the additional students new recruiting efforts bring requires yet more consideration.

"In classes, people are sitting in chairs without desks," said Zach Griggs, K-State-Salina student body president.

Some classes are so full, Melvin said, the college has had to get special permission to increase the number of students in a class.

"Our aviation maintenance program had originally capped at 44, but with our increased enrollment, we had to get special permission from the FAA to bump it up to 48," Melvin said.

Griggs said even though space is limited, he is glad to see the jump in the number of students.

"Club enrollment is high. I see a lot more involvement than I have seen in the past," Griggs said. "We have more traditional students now."

Traditional students also are filling the two residence halls on campus.

"The two residence halls we have are filled," said Roger Steinbrock, assistant director of college advancement. "They each have 50 rooms and have an approximate capacity of 100 students."

This increase of students has been good for developing the Salina campus, Melvin said.

"The increase isn't due to those coming here for just general education requirements then going up to Manhattan," Melvin said. "This growth has taken place in the majors, careers and programs that we offer at the college."

Even with cramped classrooms, packed parking lots and full residence halls, Griggs said growth is for the better.

"I think everyone on campus hopes this growth continues. The more we grow, the more noticeable we are to the community and the state," Griggs said. "The more we are noticed, the more valuable each degree from this college becomes."

FUTURE

few years ago by the Kansas Board of Regents, the more students paying tuition to K-State translates to more money for the school. In other words, the Legislature gives tuition back to the school instead of putting it into state coffers.

With that in mind, increased enrollment won't necessarily effect K-State's academic and administrative planning.

"We can self-fund new sections that are required to keep our class sections and sizes reasonable," Bosco said.

"It's not by accident the library was renovated, the Peters Recreation Complex was expanded and Provost Jim Coffman has allocated money to renovate classrooms," Bosco said.

"Those are attempts by us to maintain the quality of the academic environment while we manage our growth."

SENATE

things," Cates said. "This, however, is guaranteed time when we can get input from students."

Several Senate members said they would have a hard time fitting in another hour of required time to talk with students.

Reasons cited included the fact that some senators work, and their income put them through school.

It was decided, though, that students are Senate's first priority.

"The student always comes first, before the senator," said Kim Peschka, arts and sciences senator.

Arts and Sciences Senator Apryl Mathes said the booth would help build student awareness and make elections more competitive.

"Some of the senate elections you can hardly call an election. Let's not wait until next year," Mathes said.

Senate also unanimously approved 15 appointments to the Honor Council. The council will consist of two members from each college except the College of Arts and Sciences, which has three representatives.

Beginning next March, students suspected of cheating will be judged by their peers on the council.

"It will help get the honor code off the ground, and starting in March, those suspected of cheating will be judged by their peers," said Student Body Vice President Andy Macklin.

In other business, Senate gave its support to street improvements along North Manhattan Avenue.

Several Senate members said they would have a hard time fitting in another hour of required time to talk with students.

The proposal, supported by the city, would repaint the avenue to three lanes when surface repairs are done next year. The center lane will be a turning lane, and bicycle paths will border both lanes for traffic.

Festival to bring back part of history

BY M.A. LOROFF
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan residents will turn back time in City Park on Saturday and Sunday as mountain men, medieval knights, buffalo soldiers and pioneer settlers take over the park for the Little Apple Festival.

The festival, originally known as the Flint Hills Festival, is a folk-life festival that includes craft sales and a children's area. There also will be an entertainment stage during the weekend events.

The craft sales will include oil paintings and jewelry makers.

A folk-life exhibit will include tours of the log cabin in the park, a showcase of pioneer skills, actors who will portray medieval knights participating in sword fighting, and a mountain man encampment complete with actors in clothing from the period.

The children can ride ponies, play in a "moon walk" area and make wax hands in the children's area.

Ann Pavlik, recreation supervisor for Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department, said she expects attendance at the festival to be higher this year than in the past.

"Usually 10,000 people attend, but hopefully there will be more this year because of the game day," Pavlik said.

The entertainment stage will feature The Woody Davis Blues Revue, the Lindsborg Swedish Folk Dancers, and Jeremy and Blake on Saturday.

On Sunday, the stage will feature Dan Zerfas, Drive South and Jeremy and Blake, once again.

"We do this festival as a service to the community. It is a learning experience because people can be hands-on with the historical events," Pavlik said.

There also will be the opportunity to try different types of foods at several food booths.

There will be pizza from Papa John's, German food, kettle corn, homemade root beer, funnel cakes, Buffalo Phil's buffalo burgers and more.

The festival will be Saturday from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. and Sunday from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Studies show majority of mammals, birds also have unfaithful relationships with partners

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Only about 10 percent of birds and mammals that seem to mate for life are actually faithful to their partners, according to studies that suggest infidelity might be nature's way. Blame it on biology, say the experts.

With a little hanky-panky, animal parents might gain important benefits for the future of their species, research shows. A female might stray to pick up the best genes possible for her offspring, the experts said, while males might be driven by an impulse to father as many and as often as possible.

New studies using genetic testing techniques show that even the most apparently devoted of partners often mate around, visiting nearby nests or dens or clans to enjoy the sexual company of strangers. Birds do it, apes do it, and, of course, so do some people, researchers said in reports being published today in the journal Science.

"True monogamy actually is rare," said Stephen T. Emlen, an expert on evolutionary behavior at Cornell University. He describes a great difference between "social monogamy," where mating pairs bond and work together to raise their young, and "genetic monogamy," where parents are faithful sex partners.

Social monogamy is relatively common, but genetic monogamy is the exception rather than the rule, the studies report.

Emlen said among the primates, the animal order that includes humans, only two monkeys, the marmoset and the tamarin, are truly monogamous. All the rest, monkeys, apes and people, often mate outside their partnerships.

Most primates, in fact, make no pretense of faithfully bonding for life, and it is difficult to know for sure that males actually know which of the young in the clan are their children, he said.

That might even be true for humans, according to an Oregon study, which suggested that nearly 10 percent of children were not sired by the male partner of the parental pair.

Among the birds, faithful sex partnership has been thought for years to be widespread. Some species, such as the eastern bluebird, gained reputations as shining examples of devotion. Male and female partners work together closely to build nests, incubate eggs, then feed and raise their young.

The truth is, bluebirds have a sex life that rivals a television soap opera.

McGwire achieves baseball immortality with No. 70

By R.B. FALLSTROM
The Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — With his last swing of the season, Mark McGwire gave baseball its new magic number — 70. And even he knows he might not be around to see this record broken.

The St. Louis slugger wrapped up his record-smashing season as mightily as he started it, hitting his 69th and 70th homers in a fitting finale to a year that began with a grand slam on opening day.

Like No. 62 that broke Roger Maris' record, McGwire's 70th and final home run of the season was a line shot over the left-field wall on a first-pitch fastball. It came at 3:19 p.m. CDT on a humid, sunsplashed day off Montreal's Carl Pavano in the seventh inning.

"This is a season I will never, ever forget, and I hope everybody in baseball never forgets," an emotional McGwire told the cheering crowd at Busch Stadium after Sunday's game.

It will be hard to forget the home run derby that riveted all of baseball and much of America in 1998, as McGwire and his genial rival, the Cubs' Sammy Sosa, chased Maris' 37-year-old record.

Slammin' Sammy, with 66 home runs, went 2-for-5 with no homers as the Cubs lost to Houston 4-3 in 11 innings, but his season is not done. The Cubs face San Francisco at Wrigley Field on Monday night in a one-game tiebreaker for the wild-card spot — a game in which Sosa's stats will count.

But with his five homers on the final weekend, Big Mac put an emphatic conclusion to his season and left many wondering whether his record ever will be surpassed.

"I think it will stand for a while. I know how grueling it is to do what I've done this year," he said. "Will it be broken someday? It could be. Will I be alive? Possibly.

"But if I'm not playing," he said, "I'll definitely be there."

Sosa, as always, was gracious in all but conceding the home run race to McGwire.

"I'm real happy for him because, hey, he's the man," Sosa said. "I'm not thinking about home runs. I have to sacrifice myself for the team."

President Clinton telephoned McGwire from his motorcade in San Antonio, Texas, to congratulate him and invite the slugger and his son to the White House.

McGwire's 69th homer came in the third inning off rookie Mike Thurman on a 1-1 fastball and went 377 feet into the left-field seats at 2:10 p.m. After stomping on home plate, McGwire took a few slow steps, then made several salutes to the sellout crowd. The fans who had stood well before his at-bat demanded — and got — two curtain calls.

Kerry Woodson, a 22-year-old bodyshop worker from Maryland Heights, Mo., wound up with the ball and said he didn't know what he would do with it.

"I reached up, closed my eyes, and it landed in my glove," Woodson said. "It's a dream come true. I hope he doesn't hit any more today."

He didn't get his wish, as McGwire connected off Pavano (6-9) with two outs and two runners on base to send the Cardinals to a 6-3 win.

"Every time the replay is shown, I'm not going to turn the TV off," Pavano said. "I hope he hits 75 next year so people will forget I gave up No. 70."

This time, even a curtain call from McGwire didn't quiet the 46,110 fans, who remained on their feet, cheering even as Brian Jordan took a called third strike for the third out of the inning.

McGwire said No. 70 felt almost like No. 62, the homer that broke Maris' record on Sept. 8, with the crowd at fever pitch and Expos infielders shaking his hand as he rounded the bases.

"What can I say?" McGwire said. "I'm speechless."

The second home run ball landed in a

University officials went before the NCAA Committee on Infractions on Sunday morning in Atlanta to argue against sanctioning K-State for rules violations by football running back Frank Murphy.

President Jon Wefald, Athletics Director Max Urick, football coach Bill Snyder and others presented the university's case to the committee in an 8:30 a.m. meeting. In March, Murphy accepted money raised by several Garden City, Kan.-area boosters to purchase a used car; he served the last

Big Easy braces for slow-moving Georges' effects

By JERRY SCHWARTZ
The Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — Hurricane Georges pummeled the Gulf Coast on Sunday, bringing high wind and heavy rain to Mississippi and Alabama while New Orleans held its breath — hoping it had dodged a catastrophe.

Waves from the Gulf of Mexico leapt across beachfront roads along U.S. Highway 90 in Mississippi, and thousands crowded into nearly 250 shelters along the state's coast. Georges' 25-foot waves clipped off fishing piers along Alabama's coast, while reports were heard of waves smashing over concrete walls to demolish a fishing pier.

Though it had not yet seen the highest winds or heaviest rains, the Big Easy was decidedly uneasy. Authorities said they feared that Georges would sit overhead for days, driving Lake Pontchartrain over its levees and submerging the city. However, its course

SGA investigating need for Saferide

By TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

A proposal being reviewed in Student Senate would give intoxicated students an alternative to driving drunk.

■ OUR OPINION
The Collegian editorial board says a Saferide program can benefit K-State students.
See Page 4.

Saferide would allow bar-goers to call for a ride home after a night of drinking. An ad-hoc committee will talk to people in the city and research other universities with similar programs to find the best way to implement it in Manhattan.

"We're looking for a way it would work at K-State, and we're really not sure now," human ecology senator Robin Cates said.

Finding a sponsor for the program is one hurdle. If Service week offers opportunity to help 20 local agencies

■ MORE INFO?
Students who are interested in participating in Community Service Week should contact the Community Service Program at 532-5701.

By ANDY WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

Two hundred K-State students will participate in Community Service Week this week, sponsored by the Leadership Studies Program and Blue Key National Honor Society.

Carol Peak, director of K-State's Community Service Program, said students will help with hands-on projects in the Manhattan community.

"There are 15 to 20 agencies that students will be working at this week," she said. "Habitat for Humanity, the Flint Hills Breadbasket and the Boys and Girls Clubs all have projects lined up for the students."

Community Service Week stresses community involvement in Manhattan.

"Students have always been active in the community," Peak said. "Now we have made a real effort to organize, so we can better help the agencies and the community."

Emily Willis, senior in horticulture and student coordinator for the project, said students become a part of the community when they perform community service.

"A lot of times, students just come in and go to college and forget that they are in a community that needs them," she said. "This lets students have the chance to affect the community directly."

This week's service activities are also a way for leadership studies students to fulfill their four hour community-serv-

Motorist apprehended after ramming officer following KSU game

Dennis T. Myers, 53, of Troy, Kan., was arrested for striking a police officer with his vehicle after the K-State football game on Saturday.

According to Riley County Police Department records, Myers struck Officer Kent Bratton with his vehicle at 5:10 p.m. as he was leaving KSU Stadium.

Bratton observed Myers traveling "without regard for established traffic-control measures" during post-game traffic, according to police records. Bratton stopped Myers' vehicle, placed a traffic cone in front of the vehicle and instructed Myers to drive out of the flow of traffic so he could issue the citation.

As Bratton walked back in front of the vehicle to remove the traffic cone, Myers accelerated, striking the officer. Bratton was able to avoid injury by pushing himself away from the vehicle.

Myers fled, and Bratton issued a description of Myers and the vehicle over police radio. The vehicle was stopped at the intersection of Marlatt Avenue and Tuttle Creek Boulevard. Myers was arrested for aggravated battery of a law-enforcement officer and was released on $4,000 bond.

Jones' lawyers expect to reach settlement

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Lawyers for Paula Jones said Sunday they expected to reach a settlement soon in their sexual harassment suit against President Clinton. They said that even without an apology from the president, a deal would provide ample evidence that Clinton wronged their client.

"I'm confident that negotiations will continue through next week, and maybe a deal can be struck soon," David Pyke, one of Jones' attorneys, said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

White House aide Bruce Lindsey said there was some willingness to consider a settlement, but the president in no way was admitting guilt.

"Of course not. Lawsuits settle all the time," he said. "It has nothing to do with wrongdoing on anybody's part."

A U.S. District Court judge has dismissed the Jones case, but she is appealing that ruling. Last week, it became clear that settlement negotiations were under way as the president's lawyers sought to avoid more embarrassing court proceedings on Clinton's relations with women as Congress investigates the Monica Lewinsky affair.

It was Clinton's testimony in the Jones case that he did not have sexual relations with Lewinsky that led to Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's investigation of that White House affair.

Legal sources said the Jones legal team has offered a non-negotiable $1 million settlement but is no longer demanding that Clinton apologize for allegedly making unwanted sexual advances on Jones in 1991 when he was governor of Arkansas and she was a state employee. After the Lewinsky affair became public in January, Clinton's lawyers reportedly offered Jones as much as $750,000 to settle.

"Why take his false and empty words? They don't mean anything," Pyke said. "His actions will if he pays a substantial amount to settle the case."

Jones attorney Donovan Campbell, on ABC's "This Week With Sam Donaldson and Cokie Roberts," said if Clinton "were to turn around and pay a significant sum of money right now, that would clearly contradict this allegation of the bogus nature of the case."

Reno in 'good spirits' after fainting spell Sunday at church

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Attorney General Janet Reno fainted during a church service Sunday and was taken to a hospital, where she was reported to be in good condition.

Reno, 60, was expected to remain overnight for monitoring in the coronary unit at Georgetown University Medical Center, said Paul Katz, the center's chief operating officer. She canceled a trip to New York today, where she had planned to tour a school and give a speech this morning.

"This is just a fainting spell. Her condition is good," Katz said, adding that Reno was joking and in good spirits. Katz said her heart rhythm, EKG, heart rate, respiration and blood pressure were good.

Reno told her staff she was feeling fine and looked forward to returning to work. She read work materials and spoke with family members Sunday afternoon.

She was disappointed that the hospital television did not receive cable, preventing her from watching some final games of the baseball regular season. She asked if either Mark McGwire or Sammy Sosa had hit any home runs Sunday and subsequently was told that McGwire had hit his 69th, her spokesman, Bert Brandenburg, said.

Katz said Reno fainted at Full Gospel AME Church in suburban Clinton, Md., an hour and 15 minutes after the service began. Brandenburg said she felt nauseous while standing, sat down, fainted briefly and recovered but continued to feel nauseous.

Reno had a similar fainting spell while attending a conference in Mexico City in November 1997. Doctors attributed that fainting to exhaustion and dehydration.

Honorary family recognized at halftime of game

Clif Palmberg/Kansas State Collegian

The Ludlum family was named the 1998 K-State Honorary Family of the Year on Saturday during halftime of the football game at KSU Stadium. The family consists of Joe; Ann; Kelli, senior in animal science and industry; and Beth, a senior at Uniontown High School who could not attend.

By Lauran Cowdrey
Kansas State Collegian

Family Weekend meant something special for Kelli Ludlum's family Saturday.

The Ludlum family of Uniontown, Kan., was recognized as K-State's 1998 Honorary Family of the Year at halftime of the football game against Northeast Louisiana.

Kelli Ludlum, senior in animal science and industry, wrote this year's winning essay.

Joe Ludlum, who operates a ranch near Uniontown, and Ann Ludlum, an Allen County extension agent, said their daughter did not tell them about the essay, so they were shocked to hear they had won.

"She called and told us after the fact," said Joe Ludlum, K-State alumnus.

"We were surprised and happy."

Kelli said she entered her parents in the contest because she is thankful for their constant support of her and her sister, Beth.

"Because of my parents' enthusiasm, I was able to feel confident in everything I did, from volleyball, to public speaking, to enrolling in a university with a student-body population 100 times the population of my hometown," Ludlum wrote in her essay. "They encouraged me to constantly expand my horizons. Whether I was good at something or failed miserably, they have always been one step behind me to pat my back or pick me up and dust me off and tell me to try harder next time."

Kelli Ludlum also credited her family as being the foundation of her success at K-State.

"Kelli has done really well at K-State, and K-State has been good to her," Ann Ludlum said.

Kelli Ludlum is a member of the Alpha Chi Omega sorority, Blue Key senior leadership honorary, the College of Agriculture Ambassadors, president of the K-State Alumni Association's Student Alumni Board and is on the Dean's List.

"My close-knit family has given me a strong moral background and a basis for what is right and wrong. Because of their confidence in my judgment, I can make tough decisions on my own," Ludlum wrote. "Still, I know that whenever I have a problem, Mom and Dad are just a phone call away, and they will be more than willing to listen to me at any time of night or day."

Kelli said her younger sister also has been a factor of her success at K-State.

"My 18-year-old sister Beth constantly challenges me to be a good example and role model for her to follow," Ludlum wrote.

"I also know that she is pushing me to do my very best. ... My sister is my best friend."

Kelli said the only unfortunate thing about Family Weekend was that her sister wasn't able to attend the weekend's festivities. Beth Ludlum is a starter for the Uniontown High School volleyball team and was playing in a tournament on Saturday.

As for Ann Ludlum, a graduate of Pittsburgh State University, she said being a "Wildcat Mom" suits her just fine. The Ludlums have been so impressed with their daughter's success at K-State that they served on the parents' panel at last spring's All-University Open House, so they could share their positive experiences with other parents.

"I really enjoyed my time at K-State. I'm just glad she's had perhaps an even better time," Joe Ludlum said of Kelli.

The Family of the Year contest is sponsored each year by Chimes Junior Honorary as an effort to honor families who promote strong morals, support their children and love K-State, Chimes member Angie Shields said.

Kris Meiergerd, Chimes president, said students who wish to nominate their families must submit a 500-to-1,000 word essay on why they believe their parents should be the Family of the Year. A panel of Chimes members then evaluates the essays and chooses a winner.

Dole, others say deal between Clinton, Congress unlikely before elections

The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Three veteran politicians suggested as possible mediators between President Clinton and Congress over the Lewinsky affair said there won't be a deal before the November elections.

CLINTON

"Probably not much can happen until maybe next year," former Republican presidential candidate Bob Dole said.

"Right now, instead of a race to judgment, you are looking at a race to the election," said former White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta, who appeared with Dole and former Senate Republican leader Howard Baker on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The White House and some Democrats are looking at some sort of settlement, likely to involve censure or reprimand of the president by Congress, which would avoid months of impeachment hearings culminating in a Senate vote on whether to remove Clinton from office for trying to cover up his sexual relationship with Monica Lewinsky.

Republicans on the whole have insisted that a House Judiciary Committee must go ahead with an impeachment inquiry.

"I don't read about a deal anywhere in the Constitution," Judiciary Committee member Rep. Asa Hutchinson, R-Ark., said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"I don't think we ought to rush in that direction."

Democrats, said leading Clinton critic Sen. John Ashcroft, R-Mo., on "Fox News Sunday," "want us to have a congressional cover-up."

Dole, Panetta and Baker have been mentioned as men with the experience and respect to broker a deal. All three said it was too early for that.

"It's a nonstarter now," Dole said.

"Look down the road three or four months, who knows, but now it's a nonstarter."

"Impeachment hearings are necessary," Baker said.

"If it goes over to the Senate, then maybe there is time to talk about a plea bargain, but it is way too soon for that."

Panetta, a Democrat who has both advised and criticized Clinton, said that at this point the election is more important than the impeachment process to Clinton's future.

If the Republicans win more seats in November, Panetta said he thinks that's trouble for the president both in terms of having more Republicans sit in judgment of him and undermining his support among Democrats.

If the Democrats hold their own, he said, "I think there is a much better chance that this issue will be settled sooner rather than later."

"That's the poll that probably counts," Dole told CNN's "Late Edition" about the importance of the elections.

"The referendum will probably be on Clinton's conduct or the Clinton presidency in November."

Clinton, in Sunday's The Washington Post, praised his wife for her support in "this painful time."

"Instead of wallowing in regret, I am working at repairing my life and my marriage. My wife is a remarkable woman, and her strength and support are a constant inspiration to me during this painful time."

He said he was "diligently working with my family on the healing process. Wallowing in regret is a cop-out."

Sen. Robert Torricelli, D-N.J., on CBS' "Face the Nation," also said the constitutional process must take place before there can be any talk of a negotiated deal. But because "the House justifiably is insisting on its prerogatives does not mean this is not ultimately going to happen."

Other Democrats, buttressed by signs of a national backlash against GOP insistence on releasing the lurid details of Clinton's sexual affair, said the president did not commit an impeachable offense and that, for the good of the nation, the crisis should be dealt with quickly.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., who last month said Clinton's credibility had been shattered by his admission he misled the country over the Lewinsky affair, said on NBC that the partisan nature of the process so far was plain wrong, and that if the case came to the Senate, there will be no impeachment.

"I think the American public understands what's going on, and I think the American public is saying very clearly we've had enough of this," she said.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., also urged Congress to move quickly on the Clinton affair, telling "Fox News Sunday" that Republican focus on the matter was disrupting consideration of crucial legislative matters.

Kerry also said he took issue with the president's recent tactic of going on the offensive against Republicans.

"I regret that both he and Hillary took the line they took in the last few days. I think it was a mistake," he said

OUR VIEW

Saferide program definitely has merit

Student Senate is trying to implement a program to reduce drunk driving.

The program, called Saferide, would provide intoxicated students with an alternative to getting behind the wheel. It is a program that already has been established at a number of other colleges, and it serves to protect students and the community from the dangers of driving under the influence.

Our consensus is that the value of a program like this is a no-brainer. We need Saferide.

An ad-hoc committee is being established to determine whether Saferide would be of any use to bar-goers. There are some challenges: having enough drivers to make the system worthwhile, guaranteeing that people will be able to contact drivers when they need a ride, guaranteeing funding and resolving whether the university would sponsor a program like Saferide because of liability issues.

Many fraternities and sororities already have a designated driver system in place. It is uncertain whether members would bother to use Saferide when they simply could call members of their houses. Regardless, having a blanket driver program makes a great deal of sense. Although fraternity- and sorority-designated drivers help reduce the drunk-driving problem, they do not address the independent students who frequent the bars and who would be less likely to have an organized designated-driver system in place.

Finding enough drivers to serve bar-goers should not be a problem. A similar program at the University of Kansas has provided enough drivers for students by only using one or two drivers on Sundays and weekdays and increasing drivers to as many as seven on weekend nights. Drivers work from 11 p.m. to 3 a.m., so bar stragglers can find a ride, too.

If Saferide cannot be sponsored by the university because of the liability involved, an independent contractor would need to be found.

Funding will be the biggest problem with implementation. Saferide needs to be free of charge to riders to compel them to use it. Senate is looking at a variety of options for funding the program, including a possible privilege fee. If a privilege fee is the only option, Saferide should be voted on by the student body.

Creative funding solutions should be sought first. Student funding should be a last resort, and if the program is student-funded, it should be limited to students.

The ad-hoc committee should keep investigating options for Saferide, because we need it.

Saferide could save lives.

Silver Key members upset by focus of Collegian editorial

Editor,

We are writing in response to the editorial on Sept. 24, titled "Focus of sleep-out lost in tents, pillows."

The goal of our Silver Key homeless sleep-out is to raise awareness and money for the Manhattan Emergency Shelter, not to give us a sense of "feeling" homeless. Three years ago, the Silver Key group slept out in cardboard boxes, and it was told by the director of the Emergency Shelter, Junell Norris, that it was degrading the homeless. Norris said it continues to exemplify a negative stigma to the homeless people in Manhattan. She said we do not have homeless people sleeping in cardboard boxes in our community.

As for our sleeping situation, we did have one three-person tent for the 35 members who slept out. We voted as a group to sleep out under the stars on a tarp with sleeping bags, but we were required by our sponsor to have at least one tent, so we provided the minimum requirement.

Is that where the focus was lost?

It was stated in the editorial that the sleep-out is "a wonderful way to help raise money for the shelter, but somewhere [we] have lost our focus." We are not quite clear on what exactly you think our main point was, but when we are raising more than $2,000 for a local charity, we don't appreciate negative feedback.

We would encourage the editorial staff of the Collegian to undertake its own fund-raiser for the Emergency Shelter and become educated on the homeless situation in this community. As a group, we toured the facility and received information from the executive director so we, as an honorary society, would be more informed.

THE NEXT GREAT AMERICAN PRESIDENT

Weak crop of presidential candidates shows need to look for a new leader

VIEWPOINT

MICHAEL NEFF

With the current presidency in shambles, it is time for the American people to look to the future. Some of the leading candidates for the next presidential election are Al Gore, George Bush Jr., and sadly enough, Dan Quayle. However, I'm going to cast these conventional picks aside and propose to you some "dark horse" candidates.

First, Strother Roberts, junior in history. So what if he doesn't make the age requirement, he's a freaking genius!

Strong points — He's adept at conquering small third world countries on computer games with a mere flick of his wrist, and he got a perfect score on his PSAT. What more could you want in a leader, other than, maybe, leadership skills?

Weak points — If elected, he would probably exercise his power by doing all sorts of mean things to me to get me back for making fun of him, because he has a big forehead.

Potential presidential rating: 6.

That brings us to our second pick, Steve, the host of "Blue's Clues." I came to this conclusion while flipping channels the other day; this guy is a riot. Now there's a role model for America's youth. If you've never seen "Blue's Clues," I recommend watching. It's a worthwhile experience.

Strong points — Steve would have a tremendous foreign policy, because he likes to keep everybody involved with the decision-making process.

"What's that? A war? Where? Well, what do you think we should do about it?"

His vice-president, his dog Blue, would also aid in foreign policy with her clever dropping of clues where Steve can find them.

"Okay, now we have all three clues. A mushroom cloud, a rocket and a photograph of Saddam Hussein. Now can we guess what Blue wants to do today?"

As for travel expenses, they would be nonexistent. All Steve has to do to travel somewhere is to hold up a picture of where he wants to travel and say the magic words, "Blue ska-doo, we can too." Balk all you want at this, but I've seen it done.

Weak points — You have to wonder about a guy whose friends consist of an animated blue dog and various walking, talking household items. Who knows what would go on in the Lincoln bedroom? His cabinet would probably be composed of talking household objects, whose only goal would be to enlighten other countries on the benefits of recycling. I don't think starving Siberian citizens are going to take the preachings of a talking alarm clock and a talking piece of chalk very seriously.

Potential presidential rating: 7.5.

My last candidate, one of those cardboard cut-outs of John Wayne.

Strong points — Just the imposing figure of the Duke would keep everybody in line. No terrorist would dare bomb something governed by him, because they know revenge will be harsh and swift. I've always said we needed a president who wears a gun. Let's just see Congress get insolent with him. This man garners more respect than anyone this country has ever known. Even better, his press conferences will be nice and short — remember, he can't talk, unlike the insanity provoking oratories delivered by Clinton.

Weak points — Even though it's a cardboard cutout of the greatest American to ever live, he's still cardboard. That's going to cost him at least a tenth of a point in his presidential rating. Thus...

Potential presidential rating: 9.9.

Enjoying delicious fast foods comes at high price

VIEWPOINT

CORBIN W. CRABLE

I am a lover of fast food, plain and simple. If it can be deep fried or put on a sesame-seed bun with grilled onions, I'll eat it in a New York second.

Still, I know the dangers of fast food first-hand. We're not talking mere weight gain. There are other dangers of fast food, too — like the recurring nightmares I have of Ronald McDonald and Wendy mating and producing children who look like a cross between Bozo the Clown and Pippi Longstocking.

But seriously, the perils of gorging oneself on fast food are many. As ridiculous as it might sound, my experiences with the Golden Arches have left me with mixed feelings about hamburgers.

During my senior year of high school, I worked as a supervisor at the Oak Park Plaza and Oak Park Mall Theatres, located in Overland Park, Kan. Because I got off work every night at about 11 p.m., and food in the box office was forbidden, the only place to eat at that time of night was McDonald's. You can guess what happened next.

Throughout my senior year, I gained 15 pounds and acquired an attractive double chin (since then, I have lost the 15 pounds and am down from 165 pounds to 150). The weight gain was subtle and hardly anyone noticed, except for my parents. Meanwhile, I was shelling out enough money at McDonald's to keep Sally Struthers fed well into the next fiscal year.

So the effects of fast food were catching up with me, month after month. When the Oak Park Mall Theatres closed on New Year's Eve 1996, and I was transferred permanently across the street to the Plaza Theatres, I began to eat the food a bit less. Unfortunately, it didn't help.

I woke up in the early hours of May 9, 1997, to a sharp, stabbing pain shooting through the big toe of my left foot.

After several minutes of moaning and writhing around in bed (looking back now, it was semi-funny), I assumed it was a cramp and tried to stand and walk it off.

"Ow, ow, ow, that was such a bad idea," I whimpered as soon as I stood up. Admitting defeat, I dragged myself to my parents' bedroom, and I was away to the hospital in about half an hour.

Six magazines, three x-rays and a hospital gown later, I was told I had gout. Webster's New World College Dictionary defines gout as "a form of arthritis resulting from a disturbance of uric acid metabolism, characterized by an excess of uric acid in the blood and deposits of uric acid salts, usually in the joints of the feet and hands, especially in the big toe."

The big toe?

Although it was early in the morning and I hadn't got any sleep, a little light went on, and I slowly became aware of my situation.

One of the doctors pieced this mystery together: Foods such as hamburgers and French fries (uh-oh!) are rich in uric acids. If there is too much uric acid in the body, they can crystallize and harden the joints.

I thought gout only happened to old men.

No, I was told, there are rare instances in which it may happen to "younger folk." I was one of the lucky few; keep in mind, I use 'lucky' in the loosest sense of the word.

The doctor was kind enough to emphasize that the gout could flare up at any time. He asked me to lay off fast food for a while.

"Yeah, right," I said to myself, blinded by my own stubbornness.

He might as well have asked me to quit school and earn a living as a Jamaican steel-drum player. My only consolation was a pair of crutches and a monstrous bottle of pills.

Although the humiliation of walking on crutches lasted only a couple of days, the pain is still with me every time I buy a hamburger and fries. I wonder when I look at it: Will this be the burger that starts it all up again? Sure, it sounds corny but wait until it happens to you.

As a meat lover, I can't tear myself away from rich foods. I know these foods will only worsen my situation, yet I delight in them every once in a while — which for me is very often.

I've been free of pain for a year and a half and hope to continue this way. I feel at peace knowing I can prevent another episode, but I can only do this through willpower.

And when it comes to food, I'm weak, so wish me luck.

Pointing fingers at honor society inappropriate, unjustified

VIEWPOINT

MARY RENEE SMITH

Silver Key Sophomore Honorary members camped out last week behind the K-State Student Union to raise awareness and funds for the Manhattan Emergency Shelter. Every year, they camp out in one form or another. Every year, the Collegian does a story about the event and runs a photo of the folks spending a night or two outside.

Every year, if even for a few moments, people stop and think about the struggle of the homeless in this town. Every year, Silver Key raises money for the Emergency Shelter. This year, it raised more than $2,000, but I guess that just isn't good enough for some people.

Some of us still have to be cynics, criticizing the efforts of those around us who are trying to make the world a better place. We are all quick to point out how it could be done better. If we can do it better, why aren't we doing it?

Ask yourself, what you have done lately? When was the last time you gave a moment of your precious time to a worthy cause or sacrificed that extra few bucks to an organization to help those who are less fortunate?

I'll be the first to admit I accused the honor society of having the event earlier this year than in years past. I thought for sure it was a hell of a lot colder in years past. I wondered if it was just doing this as a public-relations ploy. I thought one night in tents with food, friends and music is hardly the experience of the homeless. I know I was not alone in what I was thinking.

But does it matter when or why? The Manhattan Emergency Shelter has more money this week than it had a week ago — at least $2,000 dollars that will buy food, supplies and pay the utility bills of those in our community that need shelter. That's more money than I gave this week. That's more money than anyone I know gave this week. So who are we to criticize?

It doesn't matter if the group spent one night, one week or one month camped outside the Union. It doesn't matter if it slept in cardboard boxes or in heated tents. It doesn't matter if the honor society members were there with their friends or if one woman spent the night out there alone.

They will never know what it is really like to be a person without a home. They will never know what is it like to have to take their children to a shelter for the night and try to sleep in a crowded room with 50 or 60 others. At least, I pray to the gods that they will never know. I pray none of us will ever know. I pray that someday, no one will ever have to know that kind of suffering.

If anything, pretending to understand the plight of the homeless by spending a few nights outside would make a mockery of those who must live this way. No matter how many nights you spent outside in a cardboard box with little or nothing to eat, you would know, when it was all said and done, you had a warm bed and a refrigerator full of food to go home to.

The struggle of being homeless is not only the pursuit of a home but the fight to continue to hope things with get better.

I am not a member of Silver Key, or any other Key, for that matter. Generally, I am not a joiner. I am a member of this community. I am ashamed that I have spent so much time criticizing the good works of others and so little time doing good works of my own.

Library won't lose more journals yet

■ Funding increase allows library to maintain number of periodicals for now.

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

Hale Library won't be cutting any more journal or periodical subscriptions from its shelves.

At least not for now.

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said funding increases last year allowed the library to maintain its current number of subscriptions.

"I see status quo. It's our intention to stabilize the total acquisition expenditures as long as this plan keeps working," Hobrock said.

Hobrock said subscriptions at the library have dropped from 9,007 in 1985 to 6,132 — a decrease of more than 30 percent.

The cause has been an inflation rate averaging 14 percent every year, he said. Everyday newsstand publications are relatively inexpensive due to high circulation, but specialized journals have a smaller audience of readers who understand the technical details. An example — Nuclear Physics costs $16,500 a year.

"That's the problem. It's not Time or Newsweek. They're throw-aways," Hobrock said.

Of the 486 titles canceled last year, Hobrock said 400 of them cost a total of $300,000.

The Kansas Legislature gave K-State a 2.5-percent budget increase for the 1999 fiscal year, which began last July. Half of a percent, $164,000, was intended specifically for Hale; university administration gave Hale an additional .5 percent, which was taken from the budgets of individual colleges.

The final tally came to a 1-percent budget increase — $328,000 — for Hale and 1.5 percent for the other departments.

Assistant to the dean Karen McCulloh said "new money," or increases to existing state funding to combat inflation, is important to Hale's survival as a respectable library. The extra funds help pay for periodical inflation so that other funds, such as those used to buy books, aren't depleted to help keep journal subscriptions.

"It means we don't buy as many books. You're ranked a lot on number of books because it's countable. That's why you need new money, so you don't have to rob Peter to pay Paul," McCulloh said.

David Weaver, KSU Foundation vice president of real estate and investment, said although the Foundation is doing what it can to help Hale, a tumultuous stock market has made that task difficult.

Under the current plan, any first-year returns from Foundation endowments in excess of 7 percent are placed into a fund for Hale.

Given worldwide financial problems, though, Weaver said the returns will be unlikely to rise above that 7-percent mark before the first quarter, which ends Wednesday. The likely result will be no funds yet for Hale or its periodicals, he said.

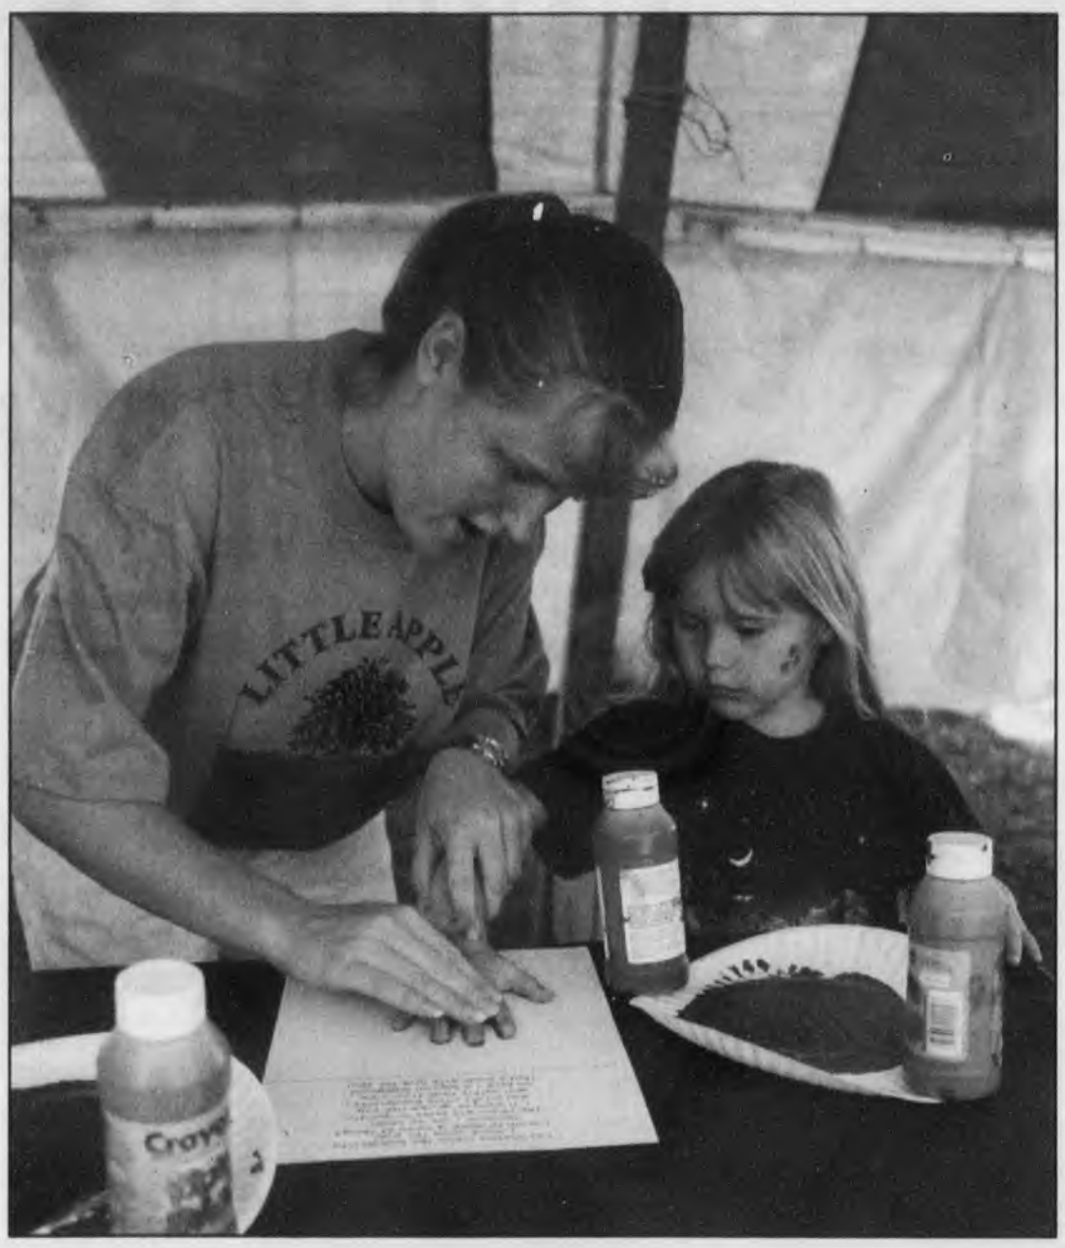
Weaver said as the market improves and endowments keep coming in, the returns should rise.

Student Body President Tracey Mann said the Kansas Board of Regents has submitted its proposal for the next fiscal year to Gov. Bill Graves. The request includes a 3.4-percent increase in total OOE funding, with 1 percent specifically for libraries.

Graves will determine how much of an increase to recommend to the Kansas Legislature when it convenes in January.

If Hale receives less than the 1-percent raise requested, Mann said he plans to take students to the Legislature to push for the full increase. The trips could start in February or March and include anywhere from five to a dozen occasions, depending on what's necessary, Mann said.

"I talk to students all the time who walk away from the library frustrated because they didn't get what they needed. I think the answer is in the state Legislature," Mann said.



Asked about the possibility of a student fee to keep up with periodical inflation, Mann said he wants to avoid a fee.

He said a fee would set a dangerous precedent for students to have to pay for something that should be covered by legislative and tuition money.

"I'm not for a student fee yet. I think we should see what the Legislature does first," Mann said.

Last spring, an 85-cent fee proposal for Hale's periodicals died in Student Senate. The fee would have created $320,000 for the library.

If a fee is proposed again, Mann said it should be presented to students as a referendum in the spring Student Governing Association Elections.

World's largest private company recruits at K-State

By SHANDA PARKER
Kansas State Collegian

Improving people's lives and standards of living is what Cargill's business is all about, Warren Staley, president and chief operating officer of Cargill Inc., said Friday.

Staley, a 1965 K-State alumnus in electrical engineering, spoke to students in Union Forum Hall about the different career opportunities available at Cargill.

"We are at Kansas State because we are looking for people who want exciting, stimulating and rewarding career opportunities and have a value system," Staley said. "We feel that K-State is one of the best learning environments to do just that."

Cargill, based out of Minneapolis, Minn., is the world's largest privately owned company, employing 80,000 people around the world.

It is an agriculture-based company with five main business areas in agriculture — bioscience, food sector, animal nutrition, trading and worldwide steel.

"KSU and Cargill have a very long history," Staley said. "K-State ranks third among universities with alumni that are employees."

Cargill has worked with K-State for 20 years through contributions and grants and recently chose K-State for its Higher Education Initiative.

Cargill works with 11 other universities through this initiative that supports university programs. In 1996, K-State received a $300,000 grant for projects such as the renovation of a computer lab in Waters Hall. The company also contributed money to help build Throckmorton Hall.

Alicia Addison, sophomore in agriculture business, went to the presentation to learn about internships. Addison said she was impressed with the company's work philosophy.

"I think it makes them attractive to people with families ... and the unity of working together in a corporate world," Addison said.

Ryan Likes, senior in milling science, had an internship with Cargill over the past summer and said his goal is to get a job with Cargill after graduation.

"I was impressed that they came and took the time to talk to students. I may be a little bit biased, because I would like to work for them again," Likes said.

It was the best of times,
It was the worst of times,
It was a first half of mistakes,
It was a second half of renewal,
It was the epoch of desperation,
It was the epoch of rejuvenation,
It was the game of darkness,
It was the game of light,
It was the autumn of despair,
It was the autumn of hope,
We had nothing before us,
We had everything before us,
We were all staying home for the winter,
We were all going direct to the Fiesta Bowl.

BY SAM FELSENFELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This just might be the year of the Cat.

Saturday's 62-7 win by the K-State football team over visiting Northeast Louisiana could be the most convincing evidence to date.

So many things went wrong for the Wildcats, yet they managed a 55-point win over a team that highly touted Florida could only beat 42-10 two weeks ago.

For starters, of the Cats' four games this year, it was probably their worst-played.

It was definitely the Cats' worst played first half.

The K-State rushing attack, which had been controlling games by averaging nearly 241 yards a contest, managed only 166 against the Indians.

Even Martin Gramatica — who won the 1997 Lou Groza Award as the top place kicker in the nation — suffered on the field, missing field goals from 35 and 45 yards.

However, the Cats' defense forced four fumbles and limited the Indians to one score on the day.

K-State quarterback Michael Bishop had his most productive day as a Cat, passing for a career-high 441 yards and four touchdowns. He also recorded a school-record 475 yards of total offense, including a 97-yard touchdown strike to Aaron Lockett, also a school record.

Although the Cats had only a 10-point halftime lead — far below the season average of 43 — the offense set yet another school record with 45 points after the break.

Bottom line: The year of the Cat? Somehow, the Cats struggled on the field but came out with a 55-point win and now have two weeks, thanks to a bye this Saturday, to make adjustments and try to improve.

"We need this off-week. It's time," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "Our first order of business is to re-evaluate every aspect of the offense, defense and kicking game before we focus on our next opponent. We've got to go back and correct our mistakes."

The Cats came out putting up big numbers, gaining 296 yards in the first two quarters. However, for the first time this season, their opponent was still in the game at the break, as the Indians went into the locker room only down 17-7.

After stopping Northeast Louisiana on the first drive of the second half, K-State drove 52 yards and

Aaron Lockett has coming-out party against Indians

BY JON BALMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The ghost of K-State past paid a visit to KSU Stadium on Saturday, and it looks like he's found a new identity.

With 188 yards on 6 receptions — including one that stretched for a 97-yard touchdown, the longest pass play in school history — Aaron Lockett took strides towards escaping the shadow cast by his older brother Kevin, who holds numerous school and Big 8 Conference receiving records.

"I think I enhanced my own game today, instead of being known as Kevin Lockett's younger brother," Lockett said. "I think it was Aaron Lockett's coming out party."

After contributing sparingly in K-State's three previous contests, the redshirt freshman became one of quarterback Michael Bishop's favorite targets against Northeast Louisiana, catching two touchdown passes in the Cat's 62-7 victory.

In the week preceding the game against NLU, Lockett said he felt the coaches would provide him with an opportunity.

"I knew they were going to give me the chance," Lockett said.

"I was just fortunate to do what I did."

Perhaps the biggest contribution Lockett made came midway through the third quarter. With the Cats pinned deep in their own territory, Bishop connected with Lockett, who spun on his defender and took the pass 97 yards for the touchdown that put K-State up 27-7. After the reception, Lockett and the Cats never looked back on the way to a 55-point victory.

When asked about his feelings following the record-setting pass, Lockett said he felt fear before elation.

"I was running for my life out there," he said.

Although Lockett's first touchdown reception began K-State's scoring, his second might have been more important to his team. After a sluggish first half, Lockett's second seven points sparked the Cats' offense to a school-record 45 second-half points.

While reluctant to label his second touchdown as a game-breaker, Lockett said he was proud to add to the cause.

"I don't think it broke the game, but I think it helped it," Lockett said. "I think we were pretty much focused, and I think that was one play that helped it out."

Lockett's 188-yard afternoon is surpassed only by senior Darnell McDonald, who holds K-State's single-game receiving record with 206 yards against Syracuse in last year's Tostitos Fiesta Bowl.

After turning in a performance that put his name in the books, Lockett said the excitement reminded him of the first time he stepped onto Wagner Field.

"It was like it was my first college game," Lockett said.

"I was excited to get the opportunity to do what I did today, and I'm glad I helped the team."

With the return of Lockett magic to KSU Stadium on Saturday, K-State fans might have the opportunity to watch Aaron Lockett overtake his brother in the record books. However, he said he's more concerned with contributing to the team before he starts chasing big brother's records.

"Hopefully, I can be more of K-State's receiving core," Lockett said. "I think Bishop earned a little confidence in me today. Not that he didn't have it, but I hadn't produced the three games before. I think that adds a little more confidence."

K-State wide receiver Aaron Lockett receives a pass from Michael Bishop in the second quarter of Saturday's game against Northeast Louisiana. Lockett set a K-State record with his 97-yard reception for a touchdown.

New show at Strecker presents insight into thoughts of artists

BY RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the art stars of the day rise to prominence on the newness of their work, making pronouncements about how their work draws on no precedent, be wary.

Behind all so-called pioneering artists lies a truth they endeavor not to face: contemporary art cannot exist without precedent.

Accomplished artists can afford to use historical precedents, where necessary, in their work without leaving open the question of originality. New isn't necessarily better. Even the Regionalists, like Thomas Hart Benton and John Steuart Curry, strived toward making a new, strictly American art, but in the end, achieved a rather stale amalgamation of traditional European precedents.

Three women, Kathleen King, Elisa Stalker Coats and Beth Neuer, artists on display at the Strecker Gallery as part of the "Introductions" show, each address this point, though not directly, in work that draws on art history. In this way, we are presented with revealing insights into the artists' personal lives, thoughts and opinions — the subject matter of choice this century.

King draws on abstract expressionist technique and philosophy, Neuer on early Christian altarpieces and Coats on the centuries-old tradition of ceramic teapots. All three are subjects of the show "Introductions," at the Strecker Gallery through Oct. 31. The show opened Friday with all but Neuer in attendance.

King's work shifts between nonrepresentation and representational abstraction. In a work like "WL/WV (White Light, White Vase)," acrylic, King makes abstraction more accessible by giving us a subject, a white bowl, but couching it in abstract terms. Like a black and white painting by abstract expressionist Franz Kline, the artist sees the two base colors as ends in themselves — utensils with which to consider the greater possibilities of light, depth, weight and volume.

King assumes a variety of abstract expressionist traditions. In a total abstraction, like the two acrylic paintings in King's "Aurora" series, the process is perhaps more important to the artist than the finished painting. Process also is revealed in her watercolors, in which layers of color build to become dark and color fields shift around the paper, bumping into each other to define objects.

"It comes from a settled state," King said. "The energy comes as a natural, responsive act to what I see. The expressions really are a sense of the considered order I see in things."

"Introductions" will run through Oct. 31 at the Strecker Gallery. Gallery hours are 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday. Call 539-2139 for more information.

Neuer's work takes on some surreal qualities as it presents room after empty room that seem to question the deeper associations of place. Usually divided into panels by painted representation, not construction, Neuer's work comes with such emotion-filled titles as "My Father's House."

Most of the work is peopleless; humans are found in portraits hanging on the walls of the empty rooms. Color, too bright to be Fauvist, is used in abundance, and a skewed perspective gives the work a dynamicism. Symbols, such as flowers in vases or religious portraits, give added meaning.

The portraits aren't always entirely convincing and seem an overwrought aspect to the work. Would the meaning in Neuer's work change much without the faces, say as more of an empty surrealist landscape?

Coats, a 1996 K-State graduate with a master of fine arts degree, shows both teapots and urns, each with a distinct personality and coated with a variety of symbols.

To see swirls and other geometric shapes as adornment to ceramics almost is expected anymore, to the point the symbols have lost all meaning and have become a superficial response to the need to decorate objects. Not so with Coats. Describing herself as a farm girl, Coats has a mature response to her medium.

"I have a love of simple pattern and culture," Coats said. "I trace that back to growing up on a farm. If you look at farmland, it's just simple patterns and texture. It's beautiful in its simplicity."

She attributes the swirl, so common a symbol in today's "design" world, to growth, further explained by the round bales of hay found on Kansas farms. On yet another layer, the swirl connects the earthen aspect of the ceramic to the obvious associations with farming. Such universal meaning in symbols practically has defined the concerns of this century's artists.

These sorts of connections drift throughout this show and contribute to a sense of completion, purposefulness and understanding through contrast. It's this perspective, while ordinary, that is refreshing and increasingly rare among shows this year.

Ice Cube's project mix of serious issues, comic relief

BY DIANA LEE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"The Players' Club," Ice Cube's latest film project, was released to video last week. It's a window into the behind-the-scenes world of a gentleman's club, where women attempt to maintain their dignity while using their bodies to make money.

In the tradition of Cube's popular flick "Friday," this film successfully mixes serious issues with a good deal of farcical comic relief.

The central character, Diana Armstrong (Lisa Raye), finds herself stripping in the club to pay for college and to support her son. She nearly is able to keep herself from falling into the traps of prostitution that nab her fellow employees, Tricks (Adele Givens) and Ronnie (Chrystale Wilson), but ultimately experiences many of the same degradations.

When Diana's cousin Ebony (Monica Calhoun) starts to work at the club, Diana starts to realize how hard it is for the women to keep their standards while they degrade themselves at work. When Ebony's associations with Tricks and Ronnie leads her into a life-or-death situation, Diana finally realizes the impossibility of working in such an environment without falling victim to the temptations to make unimaginable amounts of money.

In a deviation from the story in "Friday," Cube is able to outline a realistic, funny and well-thought-out plot that truly displays his ability to tell a unique story. He still utilizes the same jokester characters but is able to meld them better with the multidimensional players.

There is a fair amount of violence and nudity, but it all serves to further the interesting, and ultimately moving, plot.

Murders based on urban legends make for predictably hokey thriller

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Horror has a new face, but the story is still the same. "Urban Legend" premiered Wednesday night in the Union Forum Hall. Since tickets to the event were free, I'm pleased to say I didn't have to pay a cent to watch what was a hokey third installment to the "Scream" trilogy.

The plot of "Urban Legend" practically mirrored that of its predecessors, "Scream" and "I Know What You Did Last Summer." Gorgeous, half-witted college students are witness to strange murders on their ridiculously large campus. The murders are courtesy of urban legends, or stories passed down from generations. (Doesn't it always begin with rumors?)

When students and faculty begin to die in increasingly unusual ways, the students, one by one, begin to consider the possibility that the urban legends they study in class just might be coming to life.

This predictable whodunit features rising teenage nobodies, such as Jared Leto, Alicia Witt, Joshua Jackson and Rebecca Gayheart, possibly the best-known of the bunch. Please note I didn't say best, but rather the best-known.

The characters portrayed in "Urban Legend" kept true to their "Scream" counterparts; they were two-dimensional and devoid of any personality traits that would set them apart from one another. The only character with depth was the protagonist, Natalie, played by Witt, whose past comes back to haunt her in the course of the movie.

Throw in the stereotypical spooky janitor, the eccentric college professor and the sassy campus security guard, and you have a cast of characters who, excuse the pun, have been done to death.

Other than that, it mattered little to me who died and who lived.

While the movie has definite jump-out-of-your-seat thrilling moments, they are, on the whole, predictable. Audience members were screaming an entire 10 seconds before a body was dismembered. People who just wanted to hear themselves shriek ruined the thrill for those who weren't anticipating the gory scenes.

This movie proved to teach a few good lessons throughout its mundane plot and less-than-colorful cast of characters. For instance, never eat Pop Rocks and drink soda at the same time and always check the back of your car for a crazed, ax-wielding maniac before you enter it.

And when it comes to "Urban Legend," expect the expected.

Cubs, Giants to face off today in 1-game playoff

By STEVEN WINE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HOUSTON — The Chicago Cubs walked off the Astrodome field Sunday with their heads down, stunned by an 11th-inning defeat and wondering whether their season was finished.

Then they reached the clubhouse and began to celebrate.

"This," shortstop Jeff Blauser said, "has been a wild season for the Cubs."

Moments after a heartbreaking 4-3 loss to the Houston Astros, the Cubs learned they were still alive in the NL wild-card race, thanks to San Francisco's 9-8 defeat at Colorado. The score in Denver couldn't have bolstered the Cubs' mood more if it had been announced by Harry Caray himself, because it means a one-game playoff with the Giants.

"I'm halfway up the stairs coming to the clubhouse, and people were in here celebrating," closer Rod Beck said. "I knew it wasn't because we did good. People were jumping up and down shouting, 'There's a tomorrow! There's a tomorrow!'"

Two hesitant defensive plays nearly eliminated the Cubs, who blew a 3-1 lead and failed to score an earned run in 11 innings, but they're still alive.

"Maybe somebody is looking out for us," Blauser said. "What would somebody with a death-row reprieve say? Whoopee. We've got another chance."

The Cubs and Giants will meet tonight at Wrigley Field, with the winner earning a playoff berth against the Atlanta Braves.

All three wild-card contenders lost Sunday. The New York Mets were eliminated at Atlanta.

With a victory, the long-suffering Cubs would have clinched their first playoff appearance since 1989. But Houston's Carl Everett tripled leading off the 11th when a retreating Sammy Sosa shied away from the ball as he reached the warning track, and Richard Hidalgo's sacrifice fly gave the Astros the win.

The Giants and Cubs will meet in the NL's first one-game playoff since 1980, when Houston beat Los Angeles to win the West. In 1995, Seattle defeated the Angels in a one-game playoff for the AL West title.

Sosa's season overshadows the Cubs' success no longer.

"On Monday we'll have everyone in the stands rooting not only for Sammy, but for us, too," pitcher Terry Mulholland said.

While the drama built in the playoff race, there was no split-screen finish in the home-run chase. Sosa remained at 66, while Mark McGwire hit two in his final game Sunday at St. Louis to finish with 70.

"I'm real happy for him because, hey, he's the man," Sosa said. "I'm not thinking about home runs. I have to sacrifice myself for the team."

Any homers hit by Sosa today would count in his final total. Even if he remains at 66, he said he expects to go down in history.

"When they mention McGwire, they're going to mention me," he said.

Sosa singled home Chicago's first run Sunday for his 158th RBI, fourth-best in NL history. He also struck out, flied out twice and singled in the eighth, finishing 2-for-5.

Scott Elarton (2-1) pitched two perfect innings. Beck (3-4) went the final 2 and two-thirds innings — his longest outing of the season — but said he'll be available tonight. Steve Trachsel (14-8) will start for the Cubs, who remain alive despite losing six of their past eight games.

"There won't be any more scoreboard watching," Beck said.

The NL Central champion Astros played the role of spoilers well, winning for the 27th time in their final at-bat.

"You don't want anybody to win in your own park," said starting pitcher Mike Hampton, who held the Cubs to three unearned runs in six innings. "We didn't want to see them celebrate here. Plus, we wanted to go into the playoffs coming off a win."

Chiefs escape Philadelphia with 24-21 win

By KEN BERGER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PHILADELPHIA — Nothing but chunks of ice and garbage lay on the turf at Veterans Stadium, the wreckage of another loss for the Philadelphia Eagles.

Even though they scored a few touchdowns and got the tough Philly fans back on their side, the winless Eagles lost 24-21 to the Kansas City Chiefs on Sunday for their worst start in 26 years.

Philadelphia native Rich Gannon's 57-yard completion to Joe Horn in the fourth quarter set up Donnell Bennett's third touchdown run as the Chiefs sent the Eagles to 0-4 for the first time since 1972.

"We handled them most of the game when no one gave us a chance," Eagles receiver Irving Fryar said.

"Yeah, we're improving every week, but we're still 0-4. That's not a good thing."

The Eagles, who scored 15 points in their first three games, came close when Rodney Peete passed to Duce Staley for a 17-yard TD with 61 seconds left. But the Chiefs (3-1) recovered the onside kick and ran out the clock.

It was closer than anyone thought it would be — except Chiefs coach Marty Schottenheimer, who called it "exactly what we expected."

With Elvis Grbac and Andre Rison out with injuries, their replacements — Gannon and Horn — led the Chiefs to their ninth-straight victory against NFC opponents. Grbac and Rison should be healthy for a more important AFC West matchup against Seattle at Arrowhead Stadium next week.

"I think this was a great win for us, because it showed character," said Chiefs linebacker Derrick Thomas, who failed to add to his league-leading seven sacks.

In the Chiefs' first visit to Philly, Gannon was 17-for-25 for 262 yards. Bennett rushed for 87 yards and three touchdowns.

"That team was 0-3?," Chiefs linebacker Anthony Davis asked. "They didn't play like they were 0-3. We were the ones that played like we were 0-3."

Pete Stoyanovich's 21-yard field goal got the Chiefs within 14-10 with 11:38 left, and the Kansas City defense forced a punt. On the first play, Gannon lofted a long pass to Horn, who beat Brian Dawkins. Bennett ran it in from the 7, and the extra point made it 17-14 with 8:41 left.

"They ran right through the defense, and there were some communication things going on when the ball was snapped," Eagles coach Ray Rhodes said.

"That throw shouldn't have been there."

Former Eagles cornerback Mark McMillian seemed to wrap it up when his interception of Peete with 5:18 left led to Bennett's 5-yard TD run that made it 24-14.

Peete capped an 80-yard, 12-play drive with a short pass to Staley, who broke two tackles and broke through for his third TD and Philadelphia's first touchdown passing this season.

"You can never relax in this game," said McMillian, whom the Eagles decided not to re-sign in 1995.

"If they get that onside kick, who knows? We might still be out there playing."

Peete, starting for injured Bobby Hoying, was 21-for-36 for 260 yards. Irving Fryar had five receptions for 57 yards, passing Charlie Joiner for eighth on the career list with 751 catches. Staley ran for 73 yards and scored all three Eagles touchdowns.

"It's not that we're not good enough to win," Fryar said. "We just don't know how to win."

Staley capped Philadelphia's second scoring drive with a 3-yard run for a 14-7 lead in the third. On the drive, Peete hit Fryar for gains of 18 and 10 yards, the 35-year-old receiver pumping his fists while down on both knees to exhort the crowd. Russell Copeland then leaped high for a 17-yard reception to the Chiefs 3.

Kansas City stopped Staley for no gain on a fourth-and-1 near midfield late in the third, as Philadelphia couldn't capitalize on a huge mistake by Gannon, who was penalized for being on the field while the Eagles punted.

"THEY DIDN'T PLAY LIKE THEY WERE 0-3. WE WERE THE ONES THAT PLAYED LIKE WE WERE 0-3."

Three strong musical personalities join forces for a performance that will surprise and delight. Their concert features a winning mix of Bach, bluegrass, jazz, world music, with a little R&B on the side.

Fleck is an avant-country banjo player, perhaps best known for his work with the Flecktones. Marshall plays a variety of instruments from the mandolin family and has performed with the David Grisman Quintet, Stephane Grappelli and Mark O'Connor. Bassist Meyer is a composer who's at home playing bluegrass and recording country music in Nashville as well as serving as the regular bassist for the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center.

"The three together were, quite possibly the sharpest and at the same time the most relaxed ensemble I've ever seen, distinguished first by pinpoint rhythm, next by endless shades of time and touch, and finally by sheer enjoyment."

Sharing your engagement and wedding announcements in the Collegian the first Friday of every month

Your engagement and wedding are special moments in your life and the Kansas State Collegian wants to help you share the news with family and friends. This semester you can put your announcement with a picture in the Collegian's "Once in a Lifetime" special section for FREE.

"Once in a Lifetime" runs the first Friday of every month: Oct. 3, Nov. 6 and Dec. 4. It will resume in the spring semester with the following publication dates: Feb. 5, March 5, April 2 and May 7.

To publish your announcement, please complete the attached form and mail it or take it to Student Publications, Kedzie 103 (east of the K-State Student Union). The deadline for getting your announcement in the paper will be the Wednesday preceding the publication date.

Internet giving businesses access to personal information

■ Speakers say better efforts needed to protect consumers on the Internet.

By Desiree Lamberson
Kansas State Collegian

Big Brother is watching you.

With today's increasing technologies, not only is it easier to access a plethora of information via the Internet, but now businesses also can access information about you through the World Wide Web.

Solveig Singleton, director of information studies for the Cato Institute, said regulating the Internet isn't the answer to security problems. Singleton spoke as part of the Department of Computer and Information Sciences' Ethics in Computing Day on Friday in the Union Big 12 Room.

Although there have been problems with computers and the free flow of information, such as identity theft and fraud, Singleton said regulating the flow of information isn't the solution.

"I do not believe that it is a privacy problem — it's a security problem," she said.

Singleton said better security efforts were needed to protect consumers, such as individually chosen passwords for credit cards as opposed to social-security card numbers. Singleton also cited new technologies available, such as voice imprints for accessing bank accounts.

Singleton said the free flow of information should remain in the realm of business ethics, not business law, and those who abuse that freedom should be punished, instead of requiring universal regulation.

Many businesses use computers to sell lists of their customers to other, similar businesses. Singleton said those lists are often valuable, and current proposals to regulate them should not be enacted. She said that once consumers give information about themselves, they don't necessarily have control of where the information goes from there.

"Once you give information about yourself up, it would seem to make sense that the general rule would be that you would have no legal right to control that information, unless there has been a specific agreement that that information be kept confidential," Singleton said.

Virgil Wallentine, head of the computing and information sciences department, said regulation was an important topic to discuss.

"It's important that we talk about these things because ... everything we do on or near the machine is recordable — every stroke that you make, every icon you touch, every Web site you visit, everything you purchase," Wallentine said. "Everything about you that makes up your persona can be tracked at this point in time."

Maarten van Swaay, professor emeritus, said he agreed with Singleton's view that it is impossible to regulate privacy.

"If I tell you what you can and cannot do with what you know, that is a severe intrusion on your privacy by me," he said. "I can hope that you will not abuse what you know about me, but I cannot tell you what to do."

No matter what, Singleton said the free flow of information should not be shut down.

"The answer is not to shut down the flow of information," she said. "Even some information of questionable accuracy is better than no information at all."

New varieties of white wheat piquing interest

The Associated Press

ATCHISON, Kan. — Switching from traditional Kansas red wheat to the white wheat demanded by the Asian noodle market won't permanently salvage state wheat prices, but it could open new markets, white wheat growers said.

White wheat is used almost exclusively by Asian cultures and in ethnic foods such as flat breads and tortillas. However, in Kansas, considered the breadbasket of the world, it makes up less than 2 percent of the wheat crop.

Experts at the American White Wheat Producers Association said they expected that to change quickly.

"It will take five more years for it (white wheat) to become readily available. Five years after that, red wheat will be considered the specialty crop," said Kent Symns, general manager of the Atchison-based association.

With record production helping to deflate red wheat prices, Kansas farmers need to plant a wheat crop that appeals to more international markets, Symns said.

White wheat might be the quickest answer, he said. Kansas farmers appear to be listening.

Jim Schroyer, an agronomist with K-State, said he doesn't know how much additional white wheat is being planted this fall, but he said his office has been flooded with calls from farmers curious about the two new white wheat varieties introduced by researchers at K-State last month.

"It's like a car, when the new model comes out there's a lot of interest," Schroyer said. He said it probably would take two more years for the seed to be widely available.

More than a century ago, Kansas farmers latched onto hard red winter wheat brought to the state by Russian immigrants because the red wheat was well-suited to the climate. The two new white wheat varieties were bred to be equally hardy and resistant to disease, insects, drought and temperature extremes, researchers said.

The primary differences between the red and white wheats are taste and production.

Albright's push for accord passes hurdle

The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Secretary of State Madeleine Albright's push for at least a partial West Bank accord cleared a hurdle Sunday as Israel largely accepted a U.S. proposal for how much land it will yield to Palestinians.

However, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, Dore Gold, said, "If there's no security, there is no deal."

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Sunday on CNN that Israel's agreement with the United States was "almost complete about the amount of land that we would hand over. It is territory that is uninhabited by Palestinians but is very important for our security."

Netanyahu said the remaining issue was "to make sure that the land that we hand over to the Palestinians does not become a base for continued terrorist attacks against Israel."

Gold said Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority must break up terrorist cells on land it already holds on the West Bank and in Gaza and confiscate weapons.

On the Palestinian side, Yasser Kidwa, who leads the Palestinian delegation to the United Nations, said reaching a final agreement was impossible at this stage. He said Albright and her team were trying to reach agreements on several issues, and "we are not against that."

Nabil Shaath, a senior Palestinian official and negotiator, said, however, the Palestinians told Albright "that we are insisting on the package deal, and we are not ready to accept anything less than that."

Albright is laying the groundwork for meetings President Clinton will have at the White House with Netanyahu today and Arafat on Tuesday.

Questioning Arafat's commitment, Gold, one of Netanyahu's closest advisers, said Palestinian security officials were quoted in the Palestinian press Thursday as saying they are protecting 25 members of Hamas.

NCAA

of a four-game suspension during Saturday's game against Northeast Louisiana.

Though Murphy's punishment already has been determined and served, the university still could face consequences from the NCAA. The women's basketball and track and field programs are already on probation following significant NCAA rules violations within the last 5 years.

Sports Information Director Kent Brown said the meeting was a chance for K-State representatives to argue that the violation wasn't significant.

"We present our case that we think this case is a secondary violation and not a major violation," Brown said. "We think what has happened meets the criteria for a secondary violation in this situation. (Urick's) comment to me was that it went very well, and there were no surprises."

NCAA rules state that athletic boosters represent the university. That could lead to a committee ruling that K-State committed a major violation. Punishment could range from a loss of TV revenue, a ban on post-season play or a reduction of scholarships available for recruiting.

The committee also could side with K-State officials, calling the violation secondary and ruling that the university could not have kept the incident from happening.

In that case, the university would not be penalized.

NCAA rules define a secondary violation as "one that provides only a limited recruiting or competitive advantage and that is isolated or inadvertent in nature."

The committee's ruling isn't expected for four to six weeks.

In a statement issued by Sports Information on Sunday, Urick said the meeting went according to plans.

"The meeting followed the protocol set by the NCAA. There was nothing unusual about the meeting," he said. "We had the opportunity to present the circumstances of the case, and the session wrapped up in less than two hours."

Brown said Sunday's hearing was mandatory because the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is already on probation.

"Because we were already on probation with major violations occurring in our women's basketball program and track and field program, with any major violation that we have, we have to appear in front of the committee to explain what happened," Brown said.

According to K-State's report to the NCAA, Murphy received $200 cash from Garden City, Kan., resident Luke Schwieterman last fall. K-State hadn't begun recruiting Murphy actively, but Schwieterman was a "representative of K-State's interests," having donated money to the university before.

Last spring, Garden City resident Mel Riemann organized efforts to help Murphy purchase a 1985 BMW, according to the report. Murphy took the money, not knowing the exact names of the donors who collected it; he was told that the gift didn't violate NCAA rules because the money wasn't coming from a K-State booster.

Urick learned of Murphy's violations when a concerned booster called him with news that others in the Garden City area were pooling money for Murphy, according to a portion of the report written by Urick. The athletics department spent nearly $18,000 investigating the incident; officials also alerted the NCAA.

Schwieterman, Riemann and others who contributed money had their privileges revoked by the athletics department after the investigation. They no longer can attend athletic events and must pay a portion of the investigation costs before their reinstatement will be considered. The donors also were asked to not associate with or talk to K-State athletes.

Last month, Snyder said he hoped the NCAA would understand that the university had nothing to do with the incident.

"We had hopes that the NCAA would understand Frank's situation. It was a mistake; it was the wrong thing to do," he said. "We're quite confident that when the incident took place, the individual who provided the money for the automobile for Frank is someone that he had known before we were recruiting him."

Sam Felsenfeld contributed to this story.

gained some distance on the Indians, taking a 20-7 lead when Gramatica nailed a 39-yard field goal.

The Indians nearly closed the gap to six after moving the ball 84 yards on the first two plays of the ensuing drive, setting up a first-and-goal situation on the K-State 6.

The Cats gave up only one yard on three plays, setting up a fourth-and-goal at the 5. The Indians tried a fake field goal, one of several trick plays NLU attempted, but failed when holder Jason Grein's pass to Alan Ricard fell incomplete.

Northeast Louisiana never got close to scoring during the balance of the game, but Indian coach Ed Zaunbrecher said he didn't regret going for six.

"We were trying to win the ball game. We were down 20-7, and that would have made it 20-14," he said. "One of their guys took it easy on the play. If he had been coming hard like we expected, it would have worked."

After a holding call against the Cats on their first play of the next drive, Bishop connected with Lockett on the 97-yard touchdown pass up the left sideline, putting K-State ahead 27-7. The Cats then scored another two touchdowns before the fourth quarter to take a 41-7 lead.

"We had a chance to come in in the second half and put a win on the board," Northeast Louisiana quarterback Andre Vige said.

"We had them going in the third quarter. We had them down to the five and had a bad play, and they made two defensive plays. When they scored that big touchdown, it broke our backs."

The Cats added three touchdowns in the first 5:23 of the fourth quarter to close out the scoring.

With 62 points, K-State continues to lead the nation with a scoring average of 62.3 points a game.

MCGWIRE

party box and was snared by Phil Ozersky, 26, of Olivette, Mo., attending the game with a group of Washington University research lab scientists. He said he didn't know what he'd do with the ball, which has a standing $1 million offer from collectors.

McGwire, who has 10 multihomer games this year and 53 in his career, left many in awe.

"It's stranger than fiction, what this man has done," Cardinals manager Tony La Russa said.

Expos manager Felipe Alou told his young pitchers to challenge McGwire.

"I left it up to God and the kid on the mound," Alou said. "I didn't want to tamper with history.

"Thank God the season's over, or he would hit 80."

McGwire opened the year with a slam on March 31 against the Dodgers' Ramon Martinez, then led the home run race all season except when Sosa twice passed him briefly — and then for only 103 minutes in all.

Sosa led for 58 minutes on Aug. 19 before McGwire regained and went back ahead with his 48th and 49th homers in the same game at Chicago. Sosa led for 45 minutes on Friday when he hit his 66th before McGwire answered.

Before connecting Friday, McGwire had been homerless in 14 at-bats.

Across town, the homer cost the Rams a 5-yard penalty. A huge cheer spread through the Trans World Dome late in the third quarter as the Rams faced a third down just inside Arizona territory.

The sudden uproar seemed to disrupt the play calling, leading to an illegal motion penalty.

McGwire drew his NL record 162nd walk, tying Ted Williams (1947 and 1949) for the second-highest total in major league history, on a pitch that nearly beaned him in the fifth. Thurman threw the last three balls way inside and was booed vociferously after ball four.

McGwire has 180 homers the last three seasons.

In 206 career games with the Cardinals, he has 94 homers, 189 RBIs and 205 walks. At Busch Stadium, he has 51 homers and 102 RBIs in 106 games.

The distances of his homers this season total 29,598 feet, nearly 400 feet higher than the peak of Mount Everest. It's also 5.6 miles of homers.

GEORGES

wobbled a bit during the day, giving hope that a slight deviation to the east could spare New Orleans the worst of the devastation.

Thousands didn't take any chances. They fled, turning Interstates 10 and 55 into bumper-to-bumper processions. More than 1.5 million people were ordered or urged to leave New Orleans and coastal areas, and the city's streets were quiet and mostly empty.

"I'm certain that this ranks as probably the largest evacuation we have ever achieved," said Lt. Col. Ronnie Jones of the Louisiana State Police.

Intermittent downpours started Saturday night along the Gulf Coast and continued Sunday night.

High surf on top of a 5-foot storm surge threatened to undermine the foundations of beachfront homes on barrier islands along the Florida Panhandle. High winds knocked out power to at least 38,000 customers in southern Louisiana.

Widespread power outages were reported in Mississippi as the storm advanced with wind gusts up to 55 mph before dusk Sunday. A possible tornado caused damage to a business complex that housed the Jackson County studios of television station WLOX. No injuries were reported.

"Our winds have been blowing hard for quite awhile," said Lynette Carbon, director of Civil Defense in Hancock County, Miss., which borders Louisiana. "We're getting some roads covered with water, our lights are blinking off and on now and then."

Forecasters had said up to 25 inches of rain could fall on New Orleans, coupled with a storm surge that could drive millions of gallons of water up the Mississippi River toward the city. In a city that averages 6 feet below sea level and is bordered by swamps, tidal lakes and the Mississippi, the results could be catastrophic.

WEEK

ice obligation.

"The students in leadership studies get a chance to work on a project and see it completed," Peak said. "Hopefully, this will be very meaningful for them and encourage them to come back and help out the agencies."

Leadership studies students will not be the only ones assisting the community. Members of Student Governing Association, Army ROTC and the Office of Multicultural Affairs also will participate.

Peak said there are three key elements to a successful community-service effort.

"The participant should be prepared and well organized before they even begin the project," she said.

"Then they need to go out and perform the service. After the project is completed, they need to sit down and reflect on what they have just done and try to link community service as part of their life."

She said area agencies always are in search of help.

"It's nice to have a big effort for a week," Peak said. "But the need is yearround. Hopefully, students will feel that they have accomplished something this week and decide to donate their time on a regular basis."

SAFERIDE

the university sponsored the program, it would be liable for any accidents — something Cates said should be avoided. Finding a corporate sponsor for the program is another possibility.

Either way, senators are looking for a way to avoid funding the service with a student-privilege fee.

"I hope it doesn't need a student fee," she said.

"I would like to see community services become a part of it."

Students at the University of Kansas saw a $2 increase in campus-transportation fees this year to help fund a Saferide program.

The Lawrence Saferide program runs from 11 p.m. to 3 a.m. each night, with anywhere from one car operating on Sunday and Monday nights to seven cars on the weekends.

"I believe it has decreased drunk driving drastically," said Nicole Skalla, transportation coordinator for KU on Wheels.

Two cars were added for weekends, which brought wait times of nearly 30 minutes down to about 10 minutes. Wait times on weekdays are typically four to eight minutes, she said.

"When wait times go up, students aren't as likely to use it," Skalla said.

Saferide received more than 11,000 calls, had nearly 19,000 passengers during the 1996-1997 school year and costs nearly $138,000 to operate annually. Skalla said that even though everyone doesn't use the service, it benefits the community.

"If you're helping a drunk driver off the street, maybe you won't be hit," Skalla said. "You have to pay for the deterrence."

Lawrence bars usually have Saferide information posted, and bartenders make sure people know the phone number. The ad-hoc committee at K-State also will look at ways to get Manhattan bars involved in the program.

The Lawrence Saferide program runs from 11 p.m. to 3 a.m. each night, with anywhere from one car operating on Sunday and Monday nights to seven cars on the weekends.

Education senator Becky Guthrie said Saferide is not only for those who have been drinking but also for students who are studying late and do not want to walk home.

"I know it's needed from a safety perspective, because I don't feel safe walking here at night," she said.

Saferide could be ready at K-State late next year or early in 2000. Right now, the first step is to find out if students are interested in the program, Guthrie said.

"If they're not going to use it, there is no point in doing it," she said.

Matt Heddin, junior in biology, said he is against a privilege-fee increase but would like to see the program implemented at K-State if funds were made available by other means.

"It's something I would like to see," he said. "It would definitely cut down on drinking and driving."

For the program to be successful, Heddin said the community would have to work together and be sure that everyone is aware of the service.

He said if it saved one life, it would be worth it.

"It would require everyone getting into it — the bars posting the number and people being willing to call for someone else," he said. "It would require everyone doing their part."

Hurricane Georges nestles in for long stay on coast

Georges weakens to tropical storm, New Orleans spared direct hit

By STEPHEN HAWKINS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PASCAGOULA, Miss. — Hurricane Georges plowed into the Gulf Coast on Monday and parked there, pouring rain at an inch-an-hour pace before weakening to a tropical storm for what could have a long and ruinous stay.

Winds dropped to 55 mph, 20 mph below hurricane strength and down from a high of 110. New Orleans was spared the catastrophic direct hit that many in the Big Easy had feared.

That was little comfort to the thousands who huddled in shelters from Florida to Louisiana and were expected to remain there for days. Outside, all was chaos — trees ripped from the ground, windows sucked from their frames, floods roaring down roads.

"In some areas, there's water to rooftops and 4 to 5 feet of water in many other homes. I've never seen anything like it in more than 50 years," Jackson County administrator George Touart said after a tour of Pascagoula, where 15 inches of rain fell overnight.

Forecasters said up to 30 inches could fall by the time the storm clears out sometime in the middle of the week. Flash-flood watches were issued for much of Mississippi and Alabama through Tuesday. Parts of Florida also were under flood watches.

Nearly 10 inches of rain fell in Mobile, Ala., in a 24-hour period ending Monday evening. Since Saturday, Munson, Fla., was deluged with 25 inches of rain; Bay Minette, Ala., 14.5 inches and Leakesville, Miss., 8.3 inches.

National Guardsmen waded through chest-deep water to carry children and lead adults to safety from a flooded housing project near downtown Mobile, Ala. In the Florida Panhandle, Guardsmen had to rescue nearly 200 people from their flooded homes.

A man in a wheelchair was rescued in Moss Point, Miss., by emergency workers who found him trapped in his home with floodwater up to his lap.

In New Orleans, where authorities had feared the worst — a sopping rain and huge storm surge that would put the entire city under water — there was a collective sigh of relief. Instead of hitting the Big Easy head on, Georges struck at Ocean Springs, Miss., between Biloxi and Pascagoula, dealing New Orleans rain and wind but no catastrophe.

"We, by taking the brunt at Ocean Springs, saved the city of New Orleans," said Mississippi Gov. Kirk Fordice. "It was spared from the untellable misery that would have occurred."

On Monday, President Clinton declared disasters in areas of Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama that were devastated by Hurricane Georges.

The president's action triggered relief assistance for one county in Florida, 18 in Mississippi and six in Alabama, as well as 18 Louisiana parishes.

Three storm-related deaths were reported. A man died Monday in a New Orleans fire started by candles being used for light after the hurricane knocked out electricity. An 86-year-old woman died while she and 250 other nursing home residents waited for beds in a Baton Rouge shelter. A 66-year-old Pensacola, Fla., woman was killed Sunday in a house fire. Authorities said they believe she was lighting a candle because there was no power.

KSU, alliance to examine safety of food

By TL MEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the initiation of the National Alliance for Food Safety, K-State is trying to help make the food we eat safer.

This summer, K-State, along with Iowa State University, the University of Arkansas and the USDA Agricultural Research Service, formed the alliance. It consists of universities from across the nation as well as a variety of government agencies.

"The idea behind it is to bring together, at this time, 20 universities from around the country with several areas of expertise that will pretty much cover the gamut of food," said Dave Edmark, communications director for the Food Safety Consortium and currently for the alliance.

The alliance will focus on all food commodities and food safety issues, said Curtis Kastner, professor of animal science and K-State's representative to the alliance's board of directors.

The three charter universities also make up the Food Safety Consortium, a 10-year-old program that does work in beef, pork and poultry food safety.

"We here at Kansas State will continue to work with our Consortium partners to build on what we've already started and use that model of working together and expand it and initiate the National Alliance for Food Safety," Kastner said.

There are 20 institutions that are members of the alliance, with others considering joining. Membership to the alliance is not exclusive.

"Everybody's important. They bring expertise to the table, so there is not any one agency or institution that is the lead institution. It's a representation of who has expertise that is willing to come together and work together," Kastner said.

There also will be an Alliance Advisory Committee that will consist of members from the food and food-related industries to provide a "collage of input," Kastner said.

Now students can own KSU Stadium and Bramlage Coliseum.

An updated version of K-Stateopoly currently on the market allows players to become rich by owning certain properties and collecting rent on them.

"The objective of the game is to become the richest player. To achieve that, players collect years of credit and trade them in for diplomas, whereby rent on the property spaces increases and increases the income of the player," said Bill Schulte, vice president of Late for the Sky Production Company, which produces the board game.

K-Stateopoly is one of many college games offered by Late for the Sky, which also produces Kansasopoly and Mizzouopoly. Each game is tailored to include popular attractions and campus sites.

"Each collegeopoly game is created with the approval and assistance of the university, which is paid a royalty in exchange for granting us use of the school name and logo," Schulte said.

Schulte said the company's research team visits each campus and talks to students, local businesses and the alumni association to find where memories are made.

"It is our objective to have the best representation of the university's traditions and institutions that is fun to play," he said.

Schulte said the games initially are tested locally.

"We're really in the gift business. We make games people will want to give and receive because they are fun to play. We test all of our games locally first, to make sure people think they are fun and on target as far as capturing the essence of a city or college. Strong word of mouth really helps sales," he said.

The game recently was revised to update it to the tastes of the players, Schulte said.

"K-Stateopoly was just revised within the last month. We are very proud of the revision. We also updated the look of the box and the spaces on the board. I hope you will be seeing it around campus very soon," he said.

Not only is K-Stateopoly a game to play for fun, but it also can be educational. Jaime Myers, junior in hotel and restaurant management, said she played the game as part of an Accounting for Business Operations class.

"We played it to help us learn concepts," Myers said. "It was pretty fun. I learned more from playing K-Stateopoly than I would have learned from just a plain old lecture."

Myers said to play the game, the class first partnered up and then formed a business with a set number of properties. They then put up buildings and took out loans to see how accounting worked.

"We were actually applying concepts we had learned to a real-life situation," she said.

Myers said the game also seemed real because actual places in Manhattan were featured on the board.

K-Stateopoly can be found at the K-State Union Bookstore for $24.95. Late for the Sky Productions features nearly 60 college games and also 35 City-In-A-Box games.

Cubs win NL wild card

By RICK GANO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO — Now, Steve Trachsel will be remembered for more than giving up a historic home run. He's pitched those lovable losers, the Chicago Cubs, into the playoffs.

With a home run boost from castoff Gary Gaetti and two key singles by Sammy Sosa, the Cubs beat the San Francisco Giants 5-3 Monday night to win the frenetic one-game playoff for the NL wild-card spot.

They survived despite a three-run rally in the ninth by the Giants. Barry Bonds, who grounded out with the bases loaded to end the seventh, came up again with the bases loaded but managed only a sacrifice fly.

The Cubs haven't been to a World Series since 1945 and haven't won one in 90 years, yet they're going to the postseason for the first time since 1989.

And now it's on to Atlanta, an extension of one of the most exciting seasons in their storied, sometimes laughable, always eventful, history. The Cubs, who won six of nine from the Braves, play Game 1 Wednesday.

Trachsel (15-8), who surrendered Mark McGwire's 62nd home run, didn't give up a hit until pinch-hitter Brent Mayne singled with one out in the seventh.

Trailing 4-0, the Giants went on to load the bases with two outs and brought Bonds to the plate. But the three-time MVP, who has struggled in the postseason, grounded out against reliever Felix Heredia and

True story: doctoral student researches college students' lies

By JESSE MCCURRY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

New psychology research at K-State might make you think twice next time you lie to your parents about how much money you spent this month.

Rod Vogl, doctoral student in psychology, has completed a study about how often people lie.

"College students lie about things they say in social settings 38 percent of the time," he said.

"The lies can range from exaggerations like 'I waited for you for an hour' when you really didn't, to omissions of the truth or just outright deception."

Vogl said most of our lies are to protect the ones we love.

"People lie on a regular basis," he said. "We may not be aware of it, but we do it for socially appropriate reasons. It isn't always bad," he said.

Some are a little more serious.

"One person actually ran over someone's cat, re-parked his car, put the cat in the street and said, 'Look, someone ran over your cat,'" he said.

Vogl completed a study of 23 college students who kept a diary for a 10-week period, recording lies they had told. They were then tested on how well they remembered those lies.

Vogl then brought in 150 people and tested their memories of lies they recalled from the past year compared with their recollections of the truth.

"I asked them how motivated they were to lie," he said. "I'd bring them in and scale them from one to seven on how well they could remember the original lie they had recorded.

"If people are lying 38 percent of the time, I'm curious about how they can remember what they said," he said.

Vogl said if he were trying to see if President Clinton was lying, for example, he'd use a similar approach.

"I'd like to have something to go back on to clarify his memory like tapes or documents," he said. "Afterward, I'd like to sit down with him and ask him a series of questions to see what he remembers best over time, the truth or the lie."

Vogl said he would like to see what happens to a lie over time to see if it becomes the truth. Some liars do better than others, he said.

"People who are motivated to lie do it better, because they've probably rehearsed it more," he said. "That improves their memory of the lie."

Vogl said remembering it depends on how important the person is to you and what the consequences are if you get caught. He said you can look for certain signs to see if someone is lying to you.

"The harder a person tries to convince you something's not true, they're probably trying too hard," he said.

Brock Kuhlman, senior in bakery science and Latin American studies, said he doesn't have much trouble getting away with it.

"It all depends on how you define lying," he said.

"IF PEOPLE ARE LYING 38 PERCENT OF THE TIME, I'M CURIOUS ABOUT HOW THEY CAN REMEMBER WHAT THEY SAID."

Student gets 1-year suspension at MHS

Manhattan High School sophomore Jason Brinkerhoff was suspended for a year Friday as punishment for bringing a stolen gun and loaded ammunition clip to school.

Brinkerhoff, 15, will be expelled for the remainder of the 1998-99 school year and the summer term. He will be allowed to return to Manhattan High School for the fall 1999 semester.

Associate Superintendent Clark Reinke, who served as the hearing officer, said his decision was based on district policy and the recommendation of the high school's administration.

"We do have a district policy that is consistent with state and federal law, and it is consistent with that policy," Reinke said.

The gun and ammunition clip were found by school security guards in Brinkerhoff's backpack on Sept. 18. At that time, Brinkerhoff served a five-day suspension until further discipline could be determined.

Brinkerhoff's brother-in-law was arrested last week in Pottawatomie County for stealing the gun, which he gave to Brinkerhoff.

Art educator of year professor at K-State

Lynda Andrus, assistant professor of art at K-State, has been named Overall Outstanding Kansas Art Educator of the Year by the Kansas Art Education Association.

Andrus said she was excited to hear she won the award. She said it made all of her hard work worthwhile.

ANDRUS

"I was thrilled and honored," she said.

Andrus has been on staff at K-State for 14 years in the Department of Art. Her classes include Art for Elementary Schools and Studio Art Explorations.

"I really enjoyed both of the classes," Jessica Johnson, senior in art education, said. "She's really good at what she does. I admire her."

Andrus incorporates an active outreach program in her classes, where students are able to gain hands-on experience teaching art.

The program allows students to teach actual art classes to children from Manhattan and its surrounding areas, including non-profit organizations and public schools.

"Lynda Andrus is really enthusiastic and very energetic," Katie Marshall, junior in secondary education, said. "She makes you understand both art and teaching and teaching art."

In addition to teaching, Andrus has shown her own artwork both nationally and internationally in 94 art exhibitions. Regionally, for the past four years, she has presented 26 art education workshops in Kansas.

Andrus also is working on the second edition of her book, "Discipline-Based Art Education Projects in the University Classroom," which is due out next year.

Even with her numerous activities, Andrus' focus remains the same.

"I love teaching," she said. "I just want to make sure I can do a really great job."

Andrus also will be recognized at the National Art Education Association Convention in April 1999 in Washington, D.C.

Fall harvest remains ahead of schedule

TOPEKA — Harvest of Kansas' fall crops remains ahead of schedule despite continuing rains in the eastern sections of the state that has reduced the amount of time farmers can be in the fields.

Kansas Agricultural Statistics said Monday that 53 percent of the corn crop, 20 percent of the sorghum and 13 percent of the soybeans had been cut by last weekend, nearly twice the amount of those crops harvested by this time in an average year.

In addition, KAS said, seeding of the 1999 wheat crop made good progress in the western third of the state, where rainfall was the lightest last week.

With just 21 percent of the wheat acreage planted statewide, the pace has fallen behind schedule. By this time of the year, usually nearly a third of the wheat is in the ground. However, in the northwest district, 59 percent of the wheat had been planted, along with 34 percent in the southwest and 32 percent in the west-central.

KAS said 93 percent of the corn crop is now mature and well ahead of the average 79 percent for this time of year. Seventy-eight percent of the corn remains in good-to-excellent condition, and 19 percent is in fair condition.

Kansas farmers are expected to harvest a record 408 million bushels of corn this year. Soybeans also are expected to hit a record at 90 million bushels, with 71 percent of the acreage presently rated good to excellent and 23 percent fair.

Only 68 percent of the sorghum crop is rated good to excellent, with 26 percent fair. The state's sorghum output is projected at 254 million bushels, below the record 273 million in 1997.

Lack of moisture was a problem in some areas, with topsoil moisture rated 38 percent short to very short statewide, and subsoil moisture rated 32 percent short to very short.

Scope of investigation not restricted to Starr

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A formal House impeachment investigation would not be limited to the evidence presented by Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr, said Rep. Henry Hyde, the Republican overseeing the review, on Monday. Hyde strongly hinted he would vote next week in favor of opening such an inquiry.

"We're not restricted," Hyde said at a news conference. "We're the House Judiciary Committee, and we're trying to decide whether or not we should have an inquiry into whether there should be an impeachment."

The committee will vote next week, a step that would lead to hearings and an open-ended, independent investigation by Congress into allegations of impeachable offenses by President Clinton.

With public-opinion polls running against a lengthy investigation, Hyde used his news conference to mount a vigorous defense of the fairness of the GOP-controlled review to date and to announce a series of conciliatory gestures aimed at Democrats.

At the White House, spokesman Mike McCurry said, "Certainly, actions are more important than words. But the reassurances given by the chairman today were welcome."

Hyde said he hoped an arrangement could be worked out with Democrats to satisfy them on key procedural issues such as the right to subpoena witnesses at hearings expected late this year and the right to hold reluctant witnesses in contempt.

The Illinois Republican made clear he is ready to move the review to a higher, more menacing level for the president.

CORRECTION

A Student Senate story in Friday's Collegian contained an error.

Arts and Sciences Sen. Kim Peschka argued against a bill that required senators to work at a question-and-answer booth in the K-State Student Union. Peschka said senators should remember their academic obligations first before adding other time commitments.

"The student always comes first, before the senator," she said.

The bill passed 25-22.

The Collegian regrets the error.

The Fort Riley Post Cemetery is running out of spaces to bury veterans and their spouses. The 8.3-acre cemetery has a capacity of 3,315 burial plots available, and there are only five burial plots left. The cemetery began in 1854, and those buried there include buffalo soldiers, Confederate soldiers, civilian construction workers, German and Italian prisoners of war, and Congressional medal winners.

HISTORIC CEMETERY

Fort Riley's military cemetery reaching capacity

BY MIKE WATSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fort Riley's historic military cemetery soon might be closed to those who wish to be buried there.

Spaces at Fort Riley cemetery are scarce, Scott Price, community relations officer, said. Before long, the cemetery will be declared inactive.

The history of the cemetery began nearly 150 years ago when Kansas was still the territory of American Indians. The tombstones in the older part of the cemetery indicate the price that many of these people paid to provide peace and security to others, according to a Fort Riley history report.

From prisoners of war to civilian construction workers, there are many people sharing a common history. The earliest recorded burial in Fort Riley cemetery is that of Sergeant Joseph O'Donnell, Company B, 6th U.S. Infantry, who was buried on Aug. 27, 1854, according to the report.

"WE HAVE BUFFALO SOLDIERS, CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS, CIVILIAN CONSTRUCTION WORKERS, GERMAN AND ITALIAN PRISONERS OF WAR, AND SEVERAL CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL WINNERS."

– SCOTT PRICE
COMMUNITY RELATIONS OFFICER

Others buried at Fort Riley include soldiers from every war since 1853, when Fort Riley was founded, Price said.

"We have buffalo soldiers, Confederate soldiers, civilian construction workers, German and Italian prisoners of war, and several Congressional medal winners," he said.

Soldiers affiliated with the German and Italian armies regularly visit Fort Riley to pay respects to those who died at Fort Riley, Price said.

"Every year, we have Italian and German soldiers come to Fort Riley from Leavenworth to conduct ceremonies for their soldiers that died while in captivity during World War II," Price said.

Before long, every plot will be filled or assigned, he said. Qualified veterans and spouses no longer will have a secured resting place if they desire to be buried at Fort Riley.

Price served as a soldier for six years and now maintains his position as community relations officer.

"I always hoped I'd be buried here at Fort Riley," Price said. "But it doesn't look like that is going to happen."

The 8.3-acre cemetery has a capacity of 3,315 individual lots. There are five plots left. There are no plans for action at this time, Price said.

Clinton, Middle East leaders agree on schedule to speed peace process for West Bank

BY BARRY SCHWEID
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton set up a compressed schedule for concluding a West Bank accord after surveying progress in peacemaking in the Middle East on Monday at the White House with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

Netanyahu said he and Arafat had achieved a breakthrough on a long-elusive deal over West Bank territory. Clinton said after the three leaders met, "I believe that we all agreed that we have made progress on the path to peace."

Clinton also said there was "a significant narrowing of the gaps between the two parties across a wide range of issues."

The new timetable calls for Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and U.S. mediator Dennis Ross to go the region for further talks with the two leaders next week and for Netanyahu and Arafat to return to the White House for a meeting with Clinton in mid-October.

"This process needs to be speeded up," Albright said after the three-way, 90-minute meeting in the Oval Office.

Netanyahu then returned for a separate meeting with Clinton, and Arafat is due to see the president today.

While Albright steered clear of any claims of breakthroughs, she told reporters "we are very close on a number of subjects," acknowledging that an accord on how much land Israel was willing to relinquish was among them.

The biggest hurdle, according to Israeli and American diplomats, centers on Israeli demands that the Palestinian Authority dismantle terrorist cells on the West Bank and in Gaza, confiscate weapons and stop freeing apprehended suspects.

Also, Netanyahu demanded the Palestine Liberation Organization nullify numerous anti-Israel references in its covenant.

Considering that no accord emerged from the White House meeting, Albright was peppered with questions at a news conference about why Clinton had staged the three-way meeting.

"Only the president of the United States could give it this sense of urgency," Albright said.

In addition, she said Netanyahu and Arafat had been in New York to attend the special session of the U.N. General Assembly and "it really was a good use of time" to have them come down to Washington to see the president.

CLINTON

Unlike her predecessors over the last quarter-century, Albright has not engaged in shuttle diplomacy to try to prod Arabia and Israel to reach agreements. She said Monday that was not her plan now.

Netanyahu, earlier, said on NBC's "Today" program, "I think we're getting close to finalizing an agreement."

Over the weekend, he and several Israeli diplomats said there was a basic understanding that Israel would withdraw from an additional 13 percent of the West Bank, with 3 percent turned into an undeveloped nature preserve under Israel's security control.

In earlier accords, Israel pledged to yield 27 percent and has surrendered all of Gaza to the Palestinian Authority.

Clinton cautioned that some obstacles remain.

"There is still a substantial amount of work to be done until a comprehensive agreement can be reached," he said.

OUR VIEW

New 'K-Stateopoly' missing key pieces

While Late for the Sky Production Company might be the only group licensed to introduce a new version of "K-Stateopoly" — a homey K-State takeoff of the popular Parker Brothers game — the Collegian editorial board would like to unveil our own, brand-new, unlicensed, under-funded, underground and redesigned version of "K-Stateopoly."

The new version features extra-special additions, subtractions and multiplications for your game-playing pleasure. Changes include the following:

Replacing the popular "Monopoly Man (tm)," with a likeness of Jon Wefald, president and fearless leader of K-State.

We have re-molded many game pieces to look more like relevant campus landmarks, like the huge mysterious spork by H.H. King Hall; the large, round community hot tub on the east side of Calvin Hall; a traffic cone; or a squirrel.

We have made small modifications to other favorite game pieces. For instance, the popular car game piece now has a miniature Frank Murphy at the wheel.

Instead of being charged a luxury tax when you land on the wrong square, your privilege fee is hiked up and you must fork over a certain amount of money per credit hour.

Utilities have been updated to mesh better with the campus. For instance, we have replaced the "Electric Company" with the Ward Hall nuclear reactor, and "Water Works" now has been changed to "facilities workers who are digging trenches in the quad north of Hale Library."

You now have the opportunity to land on the "enrollment" and "student athletic ticket" squares on the game board to lose turns, and while we removed "free parking" because it doesn't exist at K-State, we did replace the jail with a special "wheel lock" space.

Other additions to the gameboard include special "Bob's Diner" and "Pizza Shuttle" real-estate places, as well as four spaces for various phases of Durland Hall.

We tried to reflect the campus as much as possible, and we think you will enjoy playing this special version of "K-Stateopoly." Lord knows, we had so much fun playing it that this issue of the Collegian almost was postponed until Wednesday.

Make certain to get your children our version for younger gamers, featuring the Junior Wildcat Club and KJ's Dance Club.

Good luck and happy gaming!

'In God We Trust' simply American

Editor,

With all due respect to Associate Professor James L. Armagost, I must take issue with his letter (Readers Write, Sept. 23) about the words "In God We Trust," which are minted on all American coins.

The ubiquitousness of these four words does not denote "bullying Christianity." Rather, it is a fundamental expression of our great American heritage.

It seems clear from the Federalist Papers and other early American documents that the original intention was to separate the state from the church, not the church from the state.

Should we "protect" students in public education from the knowledge that George Washington, James Madison and many other founding fathers placed their faith in God? Should America forget its glorious past in a blissful amnesia of progressivism? Did Thomas Jefferson mean the same as people do today when speaking of the "separation of church and state?"

It seems clear from the Federalist Papers and other early American documents that the original intention was to separate the state from the church, not the church from the state.

Unfortunately, this notion has been bastardized and distorted today to the point that it has lost its meaning.

Alexis de Tocqueville, a Frenchman and political thinker who visited America in the 1830s, said, "the religious aspect of the country was the first thing that struck my attention; and the longer I stayed [in America], the more I perceived the great political consequences resulting from this new state of things."

America was built on and became the most powerful nation in the world based on a foundation of strong religion, specifically Christianity, without which it will cease to be as great.

LISTEN UP! Ear-piercing fiasco leaves columnist in pain, $258 down in savings account

Two Thursdays ago, I started with a beautiful new cartilage piercing and ended up a week later with a grotesquely swollen ear, a pile of doctor bills and a blazing bonfire of hatred for the person who created the concepts of payment and money.

I'll begin with the rising action. I walked in to get my piercing, confidently signed the disclaimer and settled down for pain. I can handle pain, I thought.

They pierced me, and I was fine, but then they couldn't get the ring in, so they ran a thick metal wire through my upper ear to open the hole a bit more. It felt like a physical siren screaming through my ear, but don't worry, because I did OK. Finally, the ring was put in, and Mary was one happy camper. I paid my fee and was pretty satisfied overall.

Five days after the piercing — when it was huge, red, oozing with pus, throbbing and my glands were swollen — I called my piercing people to see if I should be worried at all. I told them I'd been cleaning it and disinfecting it just like they told me, and they said I was fine.

On the sixth day, Mary rose and went to Lafene Health Center. "Oh no!" they exclaimed. "We must get it out before your ear falls off!" (OK, so my situation wasn't quite as drastic, but they have seen it happen before).

So I lay on a table in the Women's Clinic: the stirrups attached to the table were reminding me of my gynecologist. A wonderful nurse practitioner and her assistant nurse, Mary, pried the ring from my swollen ear. In a quick instant, the ring was taken off. I felt a minute glimmer of how painful childbirth must be (I called my mother later that night to tell her how much I loved her).

The nurses then gave me a tetanus shot, watched me wash down a horse-sized antibiotic pill with a Diet Coke and set me on my way with an appointment for an ear specialist.

At 3:20 in the afternoon, Dr. Doe (name changed to protect the money-sucking, ear-poking machine of a doctor) sees me and says, "Why yes, it's infected." He squeezes some of the pus coming out of my puncture and tells me to take some more antibiotics and come back in the next couple of days.

I was there for five minutes, tops. The next day, I was there for even less time.

The last day, I was in and out. The pain and throbbing eventually stopped, and now my dear ol' ear is back to normal.

I was doing A-OK, until I got bills.

From Lafene: $29 for the shot, some ointment and the pill. The service was wonderful, and I write the money off as an investment in the human experience.

From Dr. Doe: $78 for my first five-minute consultation and poking session, $38 for the next four-minute visit and $38 for the final three-minute, "Yep, that looks all better."

From the lab: $60 for pus tests that I didn't know were run and never learned the results of.

Add to this the $15 I paid to get the hole in the first place and the fact that I don't have health insurance. The grand total — one grumbly girl who just lost $258.

I hate money. I hate using it. I hate having it. I hate that some people don't have any. I hate that some people have more than they could ever spend.

I think we put too much value on the stuff. After all, it's just green paper that has no value in another country.

I wish our society was civilized enough to do without money. If this was possible, it wouldn't be necessary to pay for things, because it all comes back to you like good karma. There would be no such thing as a payment, just true, pure, human co-existence with everyone lending a hand to one another.

I never would have thought that getting my cartilage pierced would cause so much inner turmoil.

I guess even the tiniest hole can shed a lot of light on something you would rather not think about.

K-State fans unprofessional; it's time to exhibit some class

Editor,

I would like to express my disappointment in the class act that is K-State football. This disappointment stems not from the members of the team or the coaching staff, but from the fans.

For several weeks now, I have watched students boo, curse and make rude gestures to the visiting teams and coaches. I have attended many other games at other Big 12 schools, and I have seen this type of behavior only at KSU Stadium.

On Family Weekend, with the student section filled partially by parents and younger siblings, after the usual booing and yelling at the other team, several choruses of profanities began.

I apologized to the family sitting behind me, saying this wasn't representative of all students and that this was just an emotional moment in the game.

For K-State to be considered a first-class program, not only must the team be exceptional, but so must the fans. This means cheering on our Wildcats and not booing the opposing team. How will K-State look on national television in November against Nebraska if we continue with this negative attitude and behavior?

Cheering as loud as possible for our team is great, but let's not feed the stereotype of K-State being a backwoods school enjoying its five minutes of fame by acting like idiots every Saturday afternoon.

Media's undying infatuation with Clinton wearing thin

It's a bad time to be the President of the United States.

For that matter, it's not exactly a stellar time to be a citizen of the United States, either.

It is, however, a damn good time to be a publisher. The hottest, juiciest, most intriguing book of the season is not tied up in royalties negotiations. As if sent from heaven, it's royalty free. Kenneth Starr's report on President Clinton and Monica Lewinsky is in the public domain, which makes it eligible for publication anywhere, no strings attached. It's anybody's game.

Additionally, Clinton's four-hour grand-jury testimony soon will be available on home video. Americans can replay the tawdry shame and devastating humiliation in the cozy privacy of their own living rooms as often as they like. Kind of ironic, really.

Stranger still is the fact that we know nothing about David Letterman's sex life. Although he is a national media figure who regularly lends his insight to the American political scene, we have no idea what kind of relationships he has with CBS station interns.

Even though Diane Sawyer and Sam Donaldson probably e-mail each other on a regular basis, the American public never will see the content of those messages. No one has bothered to investigate Bill Mahr's boudoir behavior, and Cokie Roberts' proclivities have been allowed to run completely unchecked.

Let's not even talk about what lonely Starr is doing behind closed doors.

It's none of our business, really.

Really.

I mean it.

I can't remember if I ever liked Bill Clinton. I only know how I am supposed to feel. I am supposed to be shocked that such things went on in the White House. As a defense mechanism, I am supposed to act smug and crack jokes about cigars and the Gap dress. I am supposed to mask my peeping-tom curiosity with a thin veneer of patriotism, and at all costs, I am supposed to demand justice for Clinton's betrayal of the American people.

Bill Clinton betrayed his wife, which is truly unfortunate. As far as the American public is concerned, he did what anyone in an extramarital affair would do: he played dumb. This also is unfortunate. It is not, however, grounds for firing a high school teacher, a computer analyst, a restaurant server or a reporter.

With the exception of the Mark McGwire/Sammy Sosa saga, little attention is being paid to domestic or foreign affairs. I don't know what to think of Clinton's presidency, because he can't do his job, or when he can, it is blurred by the situation at hand.

I believe Marshal McKluhan, communication scholar, who professed that the medium is the message. The message is loud, clear and inescapable.

A friend recently told me that no one in America responds to the word "Help" anymore and that, if accosted or mugged on a city street, one should yell "Fire!" rather than "Help." Onlookers are more apt to respond to fire, because we have been so desensitized to a genuine human need for help.

There are 1.5 million copies of the Starr report in print. Invasion of privacy has become a staple in our media. One man's mistake is a national laughing stock, and Clinton's friends and family are being destroyed systematically. Domestic and foreign policy are taking a back seat to the urgency of tabloid journalism and men's room humor.

Our president will never be able to do his job, a fairly important job, again.

It's confusing the hell out of me.

Fire.

Graves planning talks to resolve bitter dispute

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Gov. Bill Graves plans to form a discussion group within the next few weeks to explore ways to improve a bitter dispute between troopers and senior Highway Patrol managers.

The discord, which dates back several years, broke into public view last week when a legislative audit report was issued.

GRAVES

It concluded the troopers and management need to end their long-running feud and said it might take outside help to do so.

Graves said Monday he wants to start a healing process.

"I'm probably going to get a small group of folks together, including some legislators, to talk about this," Graves said.

"I don't think the Legislature wants to get involved in every fuss involving a state agency. But I think it wants to put this behind us."

Graves said the group he is assembling would not have decision-making authority, with its goal "just to shake a few things free."

He indicated both sides are going to have to give in order to resolve the dispute.

"In any kind of negotiations, the fact that somebody asks for consideration on an issue doesn't mean the answer is going to be yes," he said.

"It's not logical that either side gets everything it wants."

The audit said many troopers are unhappy with their work situation, although some of their complaints turned out to have no factual basis.

"Our survey results clearly show that there's a poor relationship between staff and upper management," the audit stated

Patrol Superintendent Lonnie McCollum told the Legislative Post Audit Committee both sides are responsible for the animosity and for the Department of Administration being unable to reach contract agreement with the Kansas State Troopers Association. A previous agreement expired last year.

Graves told reporters during an impromptu hallway news conference at the Statehouse that he was pleased with the audit report and the fact it pointed out what was fact and what was fiction among a raft of allegations.

Security flaw found in Netscape

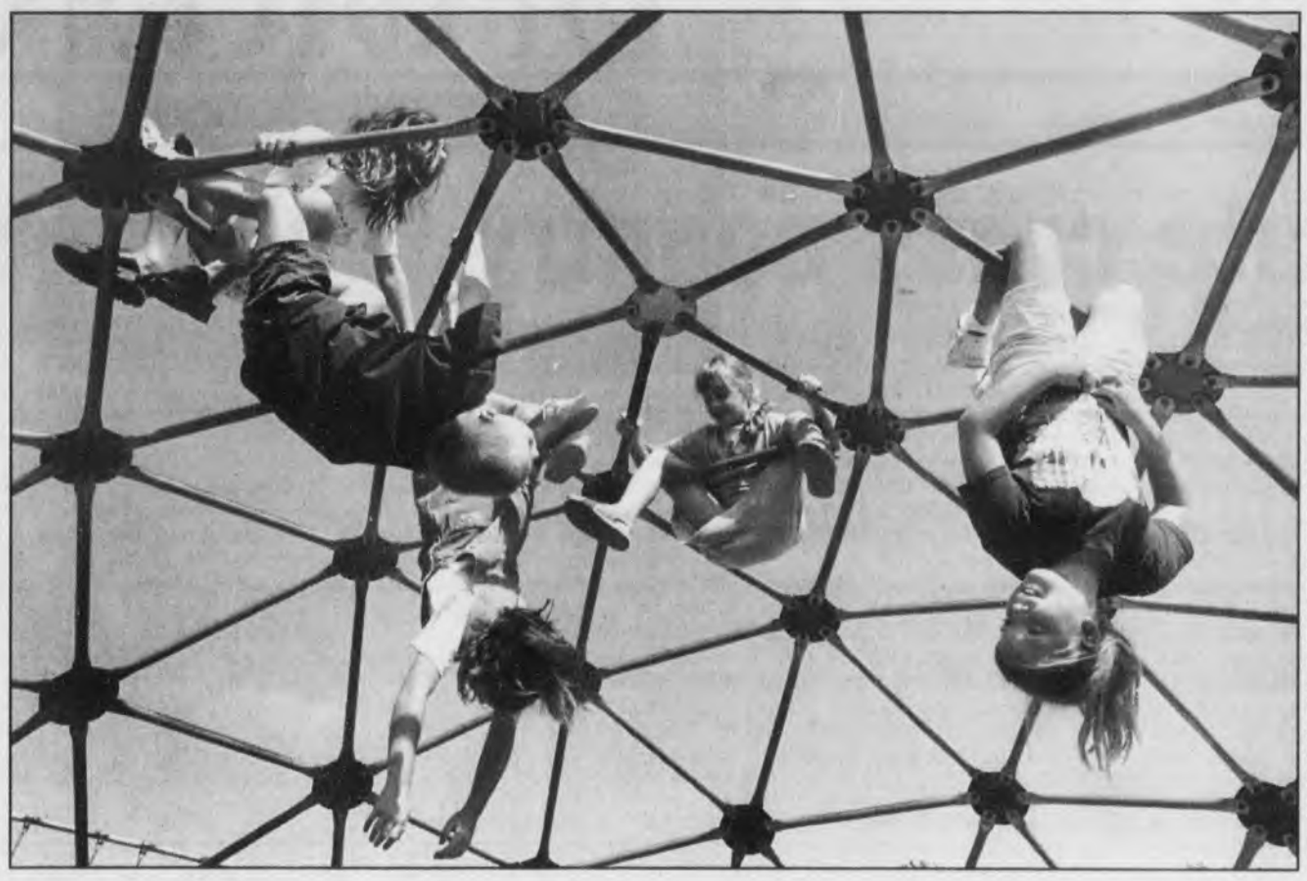
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — A computer consultant has discovered a security flaw in Netscape Communications Inc.'s popular World Wide Web browser that possibly could allow someone to read files on a user's computer.

Found by Dan Brumleve, a 20-year-old computer consultant in Sunnyvale, Calif., the flaw is accessed by a simple and widely used computer language called JavaScript. By using a 30-line program written by Brumleve, a programmer could read the contents of a user's cache, the temporary storage area on a computer's hard drive.

The cache contains versions of Web pages visited, so a flaw that reveals the cache would show the history of that person's Web surfing. Also, if they typed in any personal information, that would be available.

Encrypted information, such as credit card numbers, however, are not stored in the cache and would not be revealed by Brumleve's discovery.



Brumleve said he wasn't an expert on how serious the flaw might be, but "who knows how it might or might not be abused?"

The flaw seems to affect Netscape's Navigator browser in version's 4.0 and up.

Microsoft's Internet Explorer browser or e-mail programs are unaffected.

"Like all security or privacy issues, we consider it to be very serious and are taking immediate steps to verify and fix it," said Eric Byunn, a product manager for Netscape.

He also emphasized the flaw was hypothetical, and that no one had reported being affected by it so far.

K-State cross country team flattens Kangaroos

Wildcat women victorious in romp, men's squad squeaks out close victory

BY FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This weekend the K-State cross country team tangled tails with the UMKC Kangaroos and showed no mercy in a dual on Saturday at Shawnee Mission Parkway.

"It was a low-key meet, but we still wanted to win. And we accomplished that," Zach Davies, fifth-year senior in horticulture, said.

In a sport where the lower score wins, the women's team beat UMKC handily 15 to 43 and grabbed the first five places. Leading the way for the Cats were Annie Wetterhus, sophomore, Korene Hinds, junior, and Amanda Crouse, sophomore.

The men won four out of the six top places to edge the Kangaroos 28-29. By keeping ahead of UMKC's top runners, sophomore Brandon Jessop dashed to his second first-place finish of the year with a time of 21:44. Also boding well were senior runners Paul Birnbaum, fourth place, Brent Stover, fifth place, and Davies with a come-from-behind sixth place finish.

"This was a good test for our guys," head coach Randy Cole said. "We got a chance to see how well we could hang together, and overall we did OK.

"The conditions were pretty bad, so I like getting the experience in."

As opposed to a meet format, the one-on-one dual format was a rarity for the Wildcats.

"This was a little different format than we are used to," Cole said. "We have been running in the meets that have a lot more teams. To go up against just one team was kind of a fun format. It was more one-on-one racing and led to a more exciting race."

Davies said he felt positive about the team's performance.

"Overall, the meet was pretty good. We wanted to use the meet to practice running together as a group, and we did a good job of that," Davies said.

Cole said he had hoped for a good, aggressive team race.

"We needed to run in a tight pack the best we could," he said. "We wanted to get out well, stay together and maintain. We are capable of running much closer together but that will work itself out. Our expectations will sharpen at the end of the year."

The UMKC dual was a change of pace for K-State, who competed against Big 12 Conference racing powerhouses Nebraska and Texas on Sept. 19 at the Woody Greeno Invitational in Lincoln, Neb.

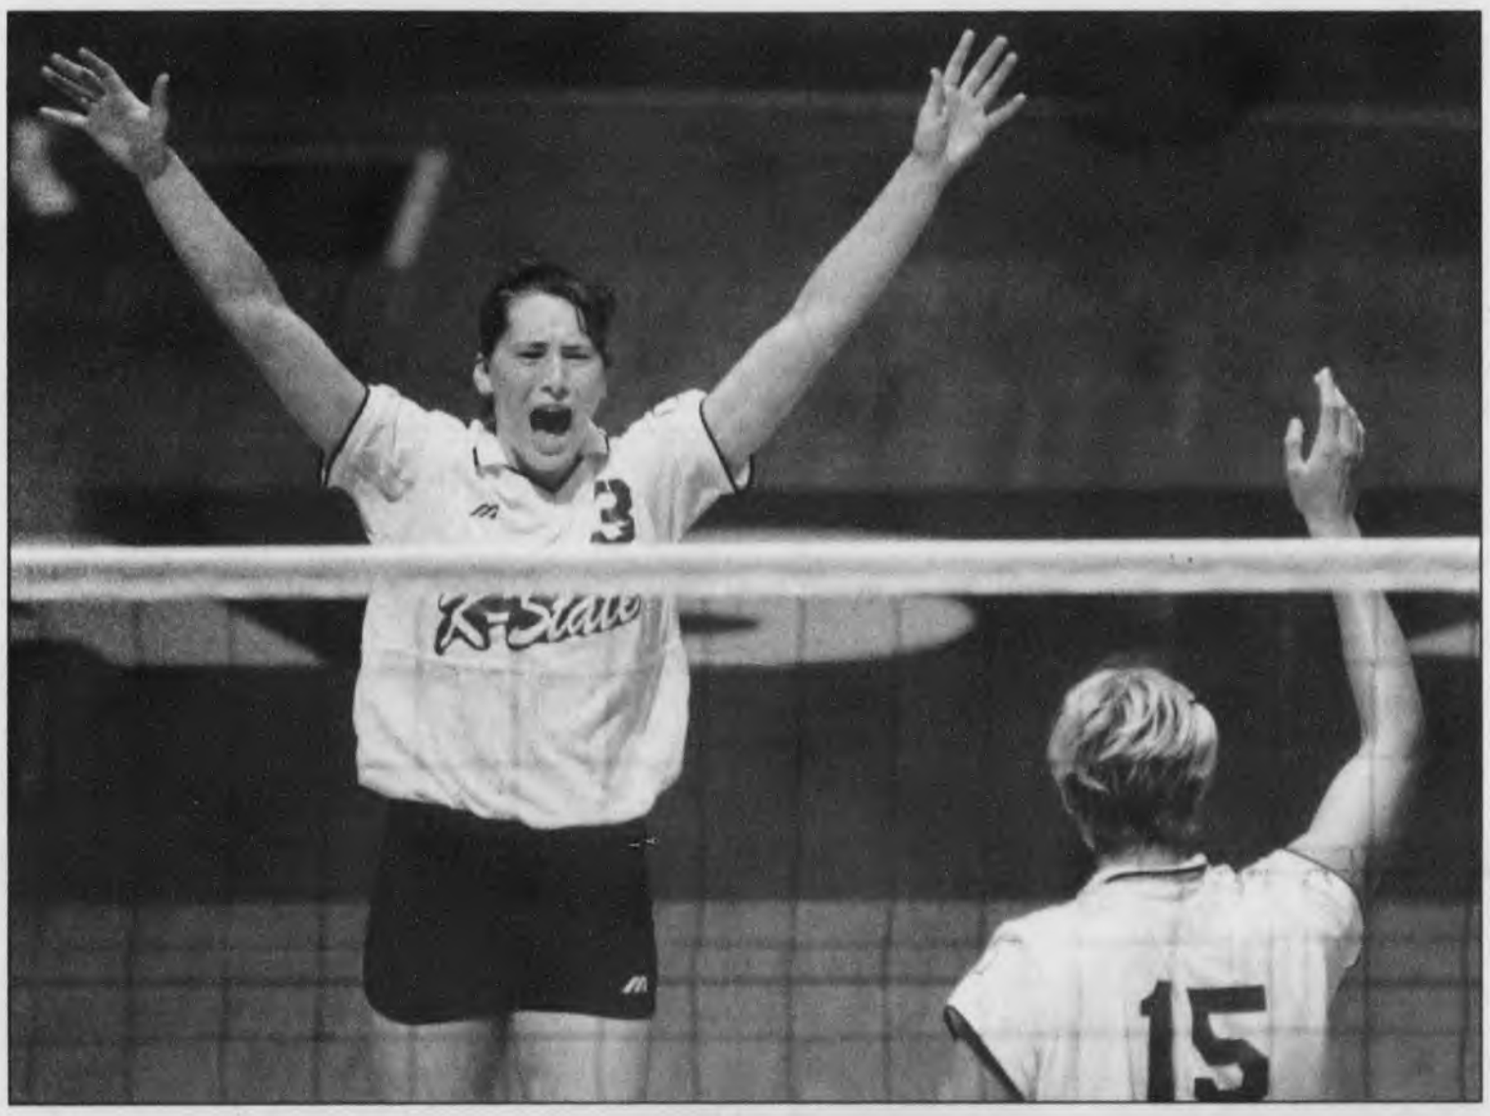
The Wildcat speedsters raced to a fourth-place men's finish, a third-place women's finish, and had two top-20 finishers in both the men's and women's races.

"It was a good opportunity to run against Big 12 opponents and gives us a chance to race on the site where the Big 12 Championships will be held on October 31," Cole said.

Jessop added to his second place finish from the Wichita Classic on Sept. 5 by snagging the individual title. Stover placed 18th, while Wetterhus and Hinds raced to seventh and ninth places on the women's side, respectively.

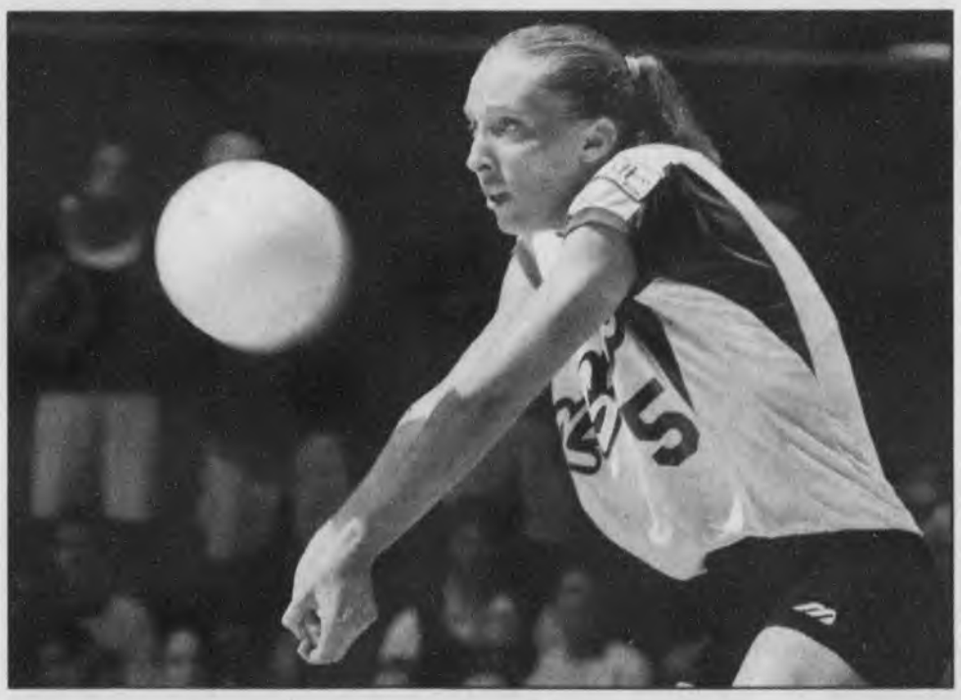
Cole said he believed the teams have run steadily this year but said they are capable of more.

"We are still slowly getting into the year," he said.



"I see different levels of fitness, but everyone has a good attitude and wants to do well."

Davies said he felt the team is improving.



"Brandon and Brent are consistent week in and week out," he said.

"Paul is coming around great and fitness level is improving every day. Overall, we are much better than we were a few weeks ago."

Next stop for the Wildcats will be Lawrence for the Pre-NCAA Invitational.

PLUCKED HAWKS

Volleyball squad storms back to defeat Jayhawks in 4 games

BY BRENT STOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

No matter the sport, anytime KU and K-State are on the same playing field, you can toss out the records and the stats.

Saturday night's volleyball match at a jam-packed Ahearn Field House was a perfect example.

Though the Jayhawks came in with a 10-2 mark, the Cats knew if they played their match, they would walk away with the win.

However, the Cats also were aware that KU would be an emotionally charged team.

"We have K-State pride," senior Val Wieck said. "There's no way we're going to lose to them."

The fact the Wildcats won the match in four games doesn't tell the whole story.

The Jayhawks stormed out of the gates quickly in game one to take a 9-3 lead.

"They came in ready and fired up," Wieck said. "It's one of those teams where you've just got to keep siding out with them, keep playing with them and eventually they'll break."

K-State came back with 11 straight points to go up 14-9, but it was too early in the match for the Hawks to break. KU reeled off seven straight points of their own to take game one 16-14.

It was the first time all season the Cats had lost a game at home.

"We don't start really fast, and we've got to get over that a little bit," Wildcat coach Jim McLaughlin said. "Early points are just as important as late points."

K-State regrouped and took control of the match in games two and three, with wins of 15-5 and 15-3.

The Jayhawks wouldn't go down easy in game four. The two teams battled back and fourth until K-State finally got a 15-10 victory.

"We were a little bit hot and cold in game four, but they were a little bit colder than we were," McLaughlin said.

Wieck said it was important for the Cats to avoid a game five.

"It was a good way we finished," Wieck said. "We wanted that win, and we did it."

Senior Kim Zschau led the Cats with 25 kills — the eighth-highest total in K-State history for a four-game match.

"Kim Zschau was all-world tonight," McLaughlin said. "She passed well. She blocked well. She hit great."

MCLAUGHLIN

Freshman Disney Bronnenberg recorded 73 assists, which was the fourth-highest total in Wildcat history for a four-game match.

The win over KU came just one night after the Wildcats recorded their first Big-12 win of the season.

Friday night, the Cats upended Oklahoma with a three-game sweep, 15-7, 15-10 and 15-9.

"We played a steady match," McLaughlin said. "It wasn't a great match, but I'd say we were in a rhythm about 60 percent of the time."

Zschau recorded 18 kills and 11 digs for the contest.

The Cats now hit the road for four straight matches starting in Texas this weekend.

K-State will take on Texas A&M Friday night and Texas on Saturday night.

Dream this little dream: Snyder, Wildcats finally find way to impress pollsters

True story: I had a dream early Saturday morning that Coach Bill Snyder bought the Evian Natural Spring Water company.

Actually, considering what's happened so far in this wacky football season (i.e., the AP polls, Frank Murphy's infraction being "major," Prairie View A&M winning a game and UCLA being UCLA), it couldn't be too far off.

In the dream, I'm occupying my Saturday seat in the fourth-floor press box staring at 42,000 purple fans who are coping with disaster.

Manhattan had just experienced a monster 6.9 earthquake minutes before K-State's 1:10 p.m. kickoff.

Initially, the sight reminded me of Game 3 of the 1989 World Series in San Francisco.

However, K-State's marching band smartly played the Wabash Cannonball nearly 100 straight times, hypnotizing the crowd and preventing an episode comparable to the final 10 minutes out of "Animal House."

While the band played and fans bobbed like pistons in that Quaker State motor oil commercial, K-State administrators dealt with a larger problem: unbeknownst to fans, there was no water at KSU Stadium, and for some reason, according to this crazy dream, having plenty of water was a necessity in playing this college football game.

Without some clever thinking, the Wildcats were destined to see their national championship hopes go the way of Hurricane Georges.

Now, stay with me. It had been a long Friday night. But pasta, chicken and a Bud Light don't create dreams like this, do they?

Suddenly, the elevator door opened and out strolled Snyder in a purple knit shirt and gray slacks, holding an Evian water bottle. After being saluted by several ROTC officers, Snyder sat beside me in the vacant press box and looked at the crowd.

"We can't let the fans down," he said.

I nodded my head.

"They've been waiting for a national championship for years," he said, "and by-gosh, they're not going to spend New Year's in Pasadena.",

Snyder snapped his fingers and within seconds, a dark-haired girl dressed in a navy blue business suit approached us, carrying a red phone. (Remember, this was only a dream.)

"Lewinsky," her name tag read.

After stealing another shot at the crowd, Snyder picked up the receiver and said, "Yes, I'd like to buy Evian Water immediately ... Manhattan, Kan. ... Thank you."

Within seconds, Evian helicopters flew above and sprayed the stadium with cold drinking water. An Evian blimp floated overhead. Evian trucks unloaded in the east and west parking lots. Willie the Wildcat drank Evian water from a gigantic bowl. The referees gulped Evian water on the sidelines.

Snyder smiled. "That's better."

"What does it all mean?" I thought while slowly tossing in a light sleep.

Sometimes, there's no sense in lingering in deep slumber. Sometimes reality gets caught between synapses, where up suddenly means down, Kansas is really good at football, and UCLA really deserves to be ahead of Tennessee and K-State in The Associated Press Top 25 poll.

I agree. After four games, all this talk of who's better than who in college football is getting a bit ridiculous. Actually, it's quite amusing. Syracuse moved ahead of Georgia in the USA Today/ESPN Coaches Top 25 even though both teams were idle. Tennessee, which beat Houston by a wider margin than UCLA did a week ago, was jumped by UCLA. Sound familiar? ESPN's Kirk Herbstreit, a Buckeye alumnus, is a proven idiot. ESPN GameDay host Lee Corso officially ended K-State's national title shot with his death wish: K-State will win the national title, he said.

So, anyhow, I'm sitting next to Snyder in the press box, admiring the spontaneous water display, and the smell of nacho chips makes me hungry.

"You want some?" Snyder asked, munching on Tostitos by the handful. I shrugged my shoulders and grabbed a couple chips.

To my left was a faceless sportswriter, slobbering while he wildly filled out his Top 25 ballot. UCLA was written next to every number.

Next to him sat UCLA coach Bob Toledo, busily playing solitaire. His Coaches ballot listed Cade McNown as the No. 1 team in America.

"Well, I got to go," Snyder said. I looked at Snyder, who was suddenly wearing a Wildcat uniform and a parachute and offered a departing wink. "What? You don't think I can beat these guys by myself?"

I laughed.

Cradling his jumbo bag of Tostitos, Snyder pressed a gold button on his chair and ejected out of the press box before settling onto the Powercat at midfield, amid thousands of cheering fans.

The faceless sportswriter and Toledo stood and applauded Snyder while fireworks exploded.

A rush of tranquility overcame KSU Stadium.

Finally, K-State had appeased the voters.

But, like I said, it was only a dream.

Finding the perfect pet for apartments, residence halls takes some education

BY AMY MILLER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

AARON FRUEHLING/COLLEGIAN

That puppy might look adorable, but students living in apartments or residence halls need to consider their individual situations before getting a new pet.

Dr. Kathy Gaughan, instructor of clinical sciences at K-State's Veterinary Medical Teaching Hospital, said students first must make sure their landlords allow pets. Then they need to decide how much time they can spend with it and, if they're getting a dog, consider the particular breed's traits.

"Some puppies will destroy your place, if you don't give them enough attention," Gaughan said.

She said she recommends the book "The Perfect Puppy; How to Choose Your Dog by Its Behavior," by animal behaviorist Benjamin Hart, for information on selecting the right breed of dog. The book lists the most popular 56 breeds in the American Kennel Club registry, then ranks 13 traits for each on a scale of 1-10. The rankings of the traits, such as trainability, territorial barking or dominance over owner, help readers select an appropriate dog.

"The book looks at different lifestyles, whether you're gone all day, single or elderly," she said. "Elderly people, for example, may want a dog with low excitability and medium watch-dog tendencies."

Dr. Gaughan said besides selecting the right breed, students on a limited budget need to make sure they can afford food, toys and veterinary care.

Another consideration, she said, is whether the animal will be litter-box or paper trained or need to go outside. If pets go outdoors, owners might have to take them to an area of the yard designated by the landlord. Although adult dogs can usually wait up to 12 hours inside without an accident, she said they just might have to go in the middle of the night, so students might want to consider the logistics of getting outside fast.

"They have to make sure they're willing to run down three flights of stairs in their night clothes," she said.

Dr. Gaughan said large dogs, which tend to be more active, need exercise at least twice a day for a minimum of 20 minutes at a time.

"That's interactive exercise," she said, emphasizing owners should be involved with their dogs' play and not just watch them run around.

She said pets can get stressed if their owners move frequently, especially cats.

"Cats are more likely to experience stress, which is manifested by not using the litter box — what we call 'inappropriate elimination'," she said.

Indoor cats live longer than indoor-outdoor cats, she said, because they won't get hit by cars or fight with other animals, and they'll be less likely to catch infectious diseases like feline leukemia or feline immunodeficiency virus.

The Department of Housing and Dining Services has regulations for pets in the residence halls, said Mardee Hutchinson, residence life office assistant. Residents need to get permission from roommates and residence life coordinators before bringing home a pet. She said the department's policy states that pets have to live in an aquarium or, for birds, a cage.

"It includes fish, hamsters, gerbils, snakes, lizards, rabbits and birds," she said. "But they won't allow ferrets or chinchillas."

Tina Valentine, of Animal House Pets, said animals that won't grow much make good pets in residence halls. She said she recommended hermit crabs, tarantulas, frogs and anoles, but not all lizards because some require larger aquariums as they grow.

Writer to read selections from memoirs, poetry

■ American Indian author raises issues ignored by public, K-State faculty says.

BY AMY MILLER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Award-winning prose and poetry writer Jim Barnes will read selections of his work Wednesday in the K-State Student Union. Barnes' latest book, a collection of memoirs titled "On Native Ground," won the 1998 American Book Award. Barnes, of Choctaw-Welsh descent, grew up in Oklahoma.

Wednesday's reading, sponsored by the Department of English, the Fine Arts Council and Multicultural Student Affairs Office, will be at 4 p.m. in Union 212.

Jonathan Holden, distinguished professor of English, said he thought the whole agenda of Barnes' writing might be summed up in his poem "Contemporary Native American Poetry."

"'You've seen it ragged against a field, but you seldom think, at the time, to get there it had to walk through hell,'" Holden said, quoting the poem. "That passage summarizes the concerns and charms of Barnes' poetry.

"Native American life is something we don't think about. Native American issues are things we just ignore. This is terribly important writing."

Elizabeth Dodd, associate professor of English, said she enjoyed the strength of Barnes' writing.

"Imagery and memory have a great deal of power," she said. "They're not sentimentalized or sanitized, but there's kind of an articulate strength in his work."

She said she noticed a "muscularity" to the language throughout his work.

"Whether it's a formal poem or free verse, there's something in the tone you recognize as his," she said.

Those not familiar with Barnes' writing will enjoy the reading, Dodd said, thanks to his strong imagery and storyline.

"He'll be very accessible to a listener," she said.

Holden said he had heard Barnes give a prose reading before.

"He's a very good reader," he said. "He reads in an incantatory style."

Barnes is a literature professor at Truman State University in Kirksville, Mo., where he is editor of the Chariton Review, a prose and poetry publication.

Celibate relationship frustrating; writer thinks he may be cheating

Dear Harlan,

I was interested in your take on suspicion about your partner.

My boyfriend and I have been slowly drifting apart the past few months.

He seems to have lost all interest in me (sex is seldom). He seems agitated when I try to discuss my feelings of loneliness and concerns about our relationship.He seems to think I'm constantly overreacting and that his behavior hasn't changed.

Classic story, I know. However, he has changed quite a bit. He was more attentive and loving in the beginning of our relationship. He was much more interested in what I was doing.

Do you think there are tell-tale attitudes or actions that can give a partner "away" if they have been unfaithful? If so, what are they?

—A Classic Story

Dear Classic,

It's never a good sign when your partner spends a lot of time in the hallway leading to his private office with his personal intern, especially if his main office is oval.

If you were to read the book, "What Men Don't Want Women to Know: The Secrets, the Lies, the Unspoken Truth," by Mike Smith and Bill Doe, you might never trust a man again. This inside look into the minds of men makes the claim that fewer than four percent of men are faithful.

While a little crude at times, Smith and Doe also offer a fidelity test that might or might not prove mildly helpful to you. But really, you don't need a test to see there are problems.

Ideally, it would be nice if you could trust your partner to speak with you if there is some kind of problem. Likewise, it would be nice if you could trust your partner to acknowledge your feelings when something is deeply bothering you.

Living this guessing game is only going to tear you apart and destroy all that's good. If your partner can't communicate and can't love you the way you need to be loved, it might be time to close the book on this classic love story.

You can always find another story. Maybe this one will end with happily ever after.

—Harlan

Friend tangled in World Wide Web of deceit, just wants out of it all

Dear Harlan,

I have a friend who is in love with someone on the Internet.

They live very far away from each other, but that's not the problem.

The problem is that they're both in relationships and have very, very young children. Their spouses don't know about their Internet relationship, and the whole thing is getting worse.

My friend wants me to be supportive. She wants me to be there when she has a fight with her husband so I can play peacemaker. I don't know what to do because I find the whole thing distasteful.

Do I just spit it out and tell how horrid I think the whole thing is?

Do I pray it just ends?

Do I try to change the subject? (Which is hard because this is all she talks about.) It's making me crazy.

—The Peacemaker

Dear Peacemaker,

Not only do they both have very young children, they both have a very kinky way of spicing up their marriages. Relax, this cyber lover is probably just her husband pounding away on his laptop in the "far away" family room.

Cleanse your palette and untangle yourself from this web of deception.

It's distasteful that she's having an emotional affair; it's distasteful that's she's being so self-destructive; and it's distasteful that she's put you in the middle of the mess.

It's time to be a true best friend and start being honest. Encourage her to go to counseling, offer your support and offer some tough love.

While it's not your place to talk to her husband, you can at least talk to her about what's bothering you. She needs to come back to reality and who better to help her make the trip than a friend.

She might not love you for it today, but she'll certainly appreciate you for it tomorrow, or at least the day after.

Language lab gets new director, more student assistants

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The first weeks of a new semester might seem hectic for anyone. But for those in foreign language classes, a trip to the Modern Language Lab seemed worse than usual.

Throughout the semester's first two weeks, problems occurred because there was no actual lab director to act as a liaison between the professors and the lab.

Rosey Zackula became the official director only two weeks ago.

She said one of the problems in the lab is many students don't know what they actually can do in the lab.

"We have facilities for almost any kind of language we teach here," Zackula said. "There can be audiotapes, videotapes or things on the computer. Someone would come in and say 'I'm in German 1; what can I do here?' They don't really know what is available."

Another problem was a lack of student employees. Now, 11 students are working in the lab; three more will be hired by this week.

Those who work in the lab have two priorities. They regulate everything that goes on in the lab, such as showing the videos on time, and help students operate the various learning tools available.

"We check people in and out and help them in any way that we can," Jamie Belcher, senior in accounting, said. "We also make sure we give them proper credit for their time."

Solutions have been devised to alleviate some of the problems in the lab. Hiring more employees, setting up schedules with all professors who require lab attendance in their classes and making sure paperwork is done correctly are a few solutions.

"We coordinated all of the professor's schedules according to what was on their syllabi and set up a master schedule. This has been in place for the last week," Zackula said.

Though the lab has been and might be chaotic in the future, it still has a purpose that benefits the students, Zackula said.

"It enhances what they get in the classroom. It is another avenue to do homework that is not necessarily graded, but you do have the opportunity to practice," Zackula said.

Next chancellor assures Germany of party's intent

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BONN, Germany — After ousting Chancellor Helmut Kohl in national elections, a beaming Gerhard Schroeder declared Monday he will try to forge a coalition between the Social Democrats he led to power and a small environmentalist party that has never before been in government.

Germans voted for sweeping political change on Sunday after 16 years of conservative rule, but pairing the pragmatic Social Democrats with the ecologically minded Greens presents unique challenges for Europe's largest nation.

At his first post-election news conference, Schroeder kept his message broad, offering assurances to his country and the world that his government will continue the stability that Kohl, the West's longest-serving leader, secured during his four terms.

"Nobody needs to be afraid. We will ensure continuity in foreign policy," Schroeder said.

"The international community can rely on Germans to remain good partners."

The center-left leaning Social Democrats won 41 percent of the vote, compared with the 35 percent won by Kohl's Christian Democrats. The Greens got 6.7 percent of the vote. If they join a coalition, they would give Schroeder's government a 21-vote majority in the 669-seat parliament.

Schroeder was quick to stress that his party — which will have 298 seats compared with the Greens' 47 — will call the shots in any coalition.

One of the first tests of the new government could be possible German participation in proposed NATO strikes to quell bloodshed in the Serb-led Yugoslav province of Kosovo, where the majority ethnic Albanians are fighting for independence.

Schroeder skirted the issue of Germany's role by saying Kohl technically is still in power.

The future chancellor avoided committing his government to specific plans before opening coalition negotiations Friday with the Greens.

The Social Democrats and Greens have some sharp policy differences in key areas such as defense and energy policies.

Interest-rate cuts likely to boost U.S. spending

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Federal Reserve policy-makers are expected to cut interest rates for the first time in nearly three years on Tuesday, acting on Chairman Alan Greenspan's alarm about a deteriorating world economy.

The question, private economists said Monday, is how much success any cut would have in containing a financial crisis that so far has proven unstoppable and now threatens more countries, including Brazil.

A reduction in interest rates by the Federal Reserve would boost the U.S. economy by making it cheaper for American consumers and businesses to obtain loans for big-ticket items. Stronger U.S. demand, in turn, would help foreign countries that ship goods to the United States.

"A Fed rate cut will help undergird a deteriorating global economic situation. But it isn't a magic bullet," said Sung Won Sohn, chief economist at Norwest Corp. in Minneapolis, Minn.

Emphasizing the urgency, international authorities were busy working behind the scenes on a rescue package for Brazil. The largest economy in South America is being hit by the same panicked rush to the exits by foreign investors that already has flattened Russia, as well as many Asian countries.

Officials in Washington said discussions were centering on emergency loans of nearly $30 billion assembled by the International Monetary Fund with contributions from the World Bank, the Inter-American Development Bank and individual countries, including the United States.

Separately, many said they hope a Fed rate cut would serve as a badly needed confidence booster, demonstrating that U.S. authorities will do whatever is necessary to keep the American economy, which is the world's largest, growing so it can serve as a market of last resort for other troubled countries.

"A Fed rate cut won't save the world, but it will start a process that will keep the U.S. economy from weakening a lot more — something that would be deadly for the world," said Allen Sinai, chief economist at Primark Decision Economics.

Last week, Greenspan said at a congressional hearing that Fed policy-makers understand the need to act quickly "to prevent the contagion from really spilling over and creating some very significant further difficulties for all of us."

Those comments were read by some as a signal that the central bank won't stop with the usual quarter-point cut but will lower rates by a bolder half-point.

"What is needed is more than a symbolic action of a quarter point," former Labor Secretary Robert Reich said Monday. He urged at least a half-point cut as a preemptive strike against the threat of global deflation, something the world hasn't seen since the Great Depression of the 1930s.

Uncertainties on Wall Street about just how bold the Fed will be affected Monday's gains. The Dow Jones industrial average finished up 80.07 at 8,108.84, but blue-chips had been up as much as 130 points early in the day.

The Fed last cut rates on Jan. 31, 1996, the final in a series of three quarter-point moves to stimulate domestic demand and keep the U.S. economy out of recession.

The federal funds rate, which is used by commercial banks as a benchmark to determine the interest charges paid by millions of consumers and businesses on short-term debt, was last changed on March 25, 1997, when it was raised a quarter point to 5.5 percent because of inflation worries.

While expressing relief that Greenspan has been able to marshal a Fed majority for rate cuts, analysts still worry about the sizable number of dangers that yet could rock global markets.

Even if economists' worst nightmares don't come to pass, they insist the world is in for a prolonged period of weak growth.

"What started in Thailand has now spread much more widely, and that makes it much more difficult to turn things around," said Jeffrey Shafer, the Treasury official who helped mastermind the Mexican peso rescue effort in 1995. "But all is not bleak. You have a series of actors who, if they do their part, will be able to build the structure for a global recovery."

ALLIANCE

K-State lends a major contribution in the area of beef safety to the alliance such as steam pasteurization, irradiation and premature browning, Edmark said.

"Their research has had major impacts on the reduction of E. coli in beef processing," he said.

Kastner said K-State also contributes expertise to beef safety and education programs relative to Hazard Analysis and Critical Control Points.

"We contribute a good understanding relative to what is going on in the meat and poultry industry with respect to needed intervention strategies, whether it is steam pasteurization or whatever," Kastner said.

K-State works closely with the meat industry and has established good working relationships with governmental agencies and consumer groups, Kastner said.

"We contribute to the alliance an excellent background in automated and rapid detection technology," he said. "We have good industry relationships."

Kastner said an example of their good relationships is how K-State's steam pasteurization technique for beef carcasses went from concept to application within a year and a half.

The alliance is still in its organizational phase, Edmark said. The alliance's next meeting is in November in Washington, D.C.

There the alliance will have its "coming out," Kastner said. It also will be a focus time for the members to learn more about the alliance.

"I think the National Alliance for Food Safety will be a strong force in the future," Kastner said.

Caribbean, Georges killed more than 300 people.

"We got off pretty lucky," said Derek Pociask, who was walking his dogs through a burst of rain on St. Charles Avenue in New Orleans. "It'd be nice to have electricity, but I'm glad this has turned out to be just a bad rainstorm."

More than 678,000 customers were without power across the Gulf Coast. As the storm moved in, more than 1.5 million people had been told to evacuate along the coast, and hotel rooms were hard to find as far away as Memphis, Tenn., and Dallas.

"Everybody's been sleeping or everybody's been watching the rain," said Becky Chamberlain, 15, at a Gulfport shelter. "Mostly everybody has been waiting for this to go away."

Nearly 14,700 people in Mississippi alone were staying in shelters, though their safety was not assured: The roof was ripped off a gymnasium at Mississippi Gulf Coast Community College in Gautier, forcing the evacuation of 404 residents. Ninety others at Trent Lott Middle School in Pascagoula stayed put after the roof was damaged, apparently by a tornado.

Most evacuees were told to put off any plans to return to their homes because it was too dangerous.

In New Orleans, 10,000 spent the night in the Superdome. Thousands left the stadium and other New Orleans shelters Monday evening.

Mayor Marc Morial said hurricane evacuees staying in shelters could go home Monday night but that he would prefer they remain overnight for their own safety.

The mayor also extended New Orleans' 24-hour curfew until 5 a.m. Tuesday. Exceptions to the curfew were people returning from out of town and people leaving shelters, hotels, motels and other places where they sought refuge.

"You can only take so much and then you start getting crazy," John Waguespack said as he walked out of the Dome. "We're grateful we could come here and now we're glad to leave."

Just as they had Saturday and Sunday, the evacuees returning to the city caused massive traffic jams on interstate highways.

At 8 p.m. EDT, the center of tropical storm Georges was located about 20 miles to the north of Biloxi, Miss.

Maximum sustained winds decreased to an estimated 55 mph and continued weakening was forecast. Tropical storm force winds extended outward up to 145 miles mainly to the south of the center. Georges drifted erratically Monday evening and little additional movement was expected overnight.

Everywhere within 70 miles of the core of Georges bore the mark of the hurricane.

Billboards along the interstates were ripped apart; streets were littered with the storm's refuse.

At the downtown waterfront in Mobile, Ala., cars were half-submerged in the parking garage of the convention center.

Georges arrived with "a howling sound that never quits," said Greg Myles, who stayed through the night with his wife, Sandra, and teenage daughter, Ashley, in their house about 100 yards from the crashing waves of Mobile Bay.

Two trees fell in their yard and bay waters began rising toward them. They made it through the night with the help of "catnaps and a bottle of wine," Sandra Myles said.

HOLY COW

slammed his helmet to the ground.

In the ninth, reliever Kevin Tapani gave up a pair of leadoff singles. That brought on Terry Mulholland, who went eight innings and threw 121 pitches Sunday.

Stan Javier hit an RBI single and pinch-hitter Ellis Burks walked, loaded the bases with no outs and the score 5-1. But Bonds flied out, and then Rod Beck earned his 51st save, getting Jeff Kent on an RBI forceout and retiring Joe Carter on a popup.

It was Carter's final at-bat in the majors. At 38, the hero of the 1993 World Series is retiring.

The Cubs nearly did not get this far, losing six of their previous eight games, including Sunday's finale in Houston. But they were saved when Colorado rallied from a 7-0 deficit to beat the Giants 9-8, forcing the first one-game playoff in the NL since 1980.

Trachsel and Giants starter Mark Gardner kept it scoreless until the fifth inning.

Henry Rodriguez singled and then Gaetti lifted a two-run homer to left, his 19th of the season and eighth since joining the Cubs on Aug. 19 — his 40th birthday — after his release by St. Louis.

Gaetti raised his arms in triumph as the ball landed in the left-field seats and after a delay as fans littered the field, he emerged from the dugout for a Sosa-like curtain call.

Singles by Lance Johnson and Sosa drove out Gardner (13-6) in the sixth. Rich Rodriguez relieved and after Grace walked to load the bases, Matt Mieske, called up from the minors earlier this month, lined a two-run single to right for a 4-0 lead.

Sosa went 2-for-4 with a pair of singles, scoring in the eighth on Jose Mesa's wild pitch.

Sosa finished the regular season, because this game's numbers counted, with 66 home runs, trailing McGwire's 70.

But Sosa gets something McGwire doesn't — a chance to play into October.

Monday night's game was the first one-game playoff in the National League since 1980 when the Houston Astros beat the Dodgers 7-1 to win the NL West. In 1995, Seattle beat the Angels 9-1 in a one-game showdown for the AL West.

The Cubs beat the Giants — then the New York Giants — in 1908's final game for the NL pennant and a trip to the World Series. They beat the Detroit Tigers in five games — the Cubs' last World Series win.

Congress lowers interest rates on student loans

By ROBERT GREENE
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The millions of students who borrow money for college will pay less interest because of a higher-education bill that cleared Congress on Tuesday.

President Clinton said he will sign the bill, which also raises the ceiling on grants and work-study for needy students.

He urged Congress to enact separate legislation needed to pay for the increases as well as other programs authorized in the bill.

The bill "demonstrates how we can make progress on education policy when we choose bipartisan cooperation over division," Clinton said.

Besides providing more student aid and streamlining its delivery, the five-year reauthorization of higher education programs takes steps to improve teacher preparation, monitor college costs, report campus crimes, monitor hate crimes and discourage drug or alcohol abuse.

The student-aid provisions are the centerpiece of the legislation.

"In the face of rising college costs, Congress will provide students with the lowest-cost loans in nearly two decades," said Sen. James Jeffords, R-Vt., and chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee, before the 96-0 vote.

The House had passed the bill Monday on a voice vote.

The bill creates a new interest-rate formula, based on Treasury bill rates and added points, for student loans. As a result, the rate for students would be 7.46 percent for graduates starting to repay their loans — the lowest rate in 17 years. Rates are capped at 8.24 percent.

New bill will aim to improve other aspects of college experience

Lenders would get a subsidy to keep down the costs. They had threatened earlier to pull out of the loan program because of a previously scheduled change in the loan formula that since has been repealed.

Under the bill, a student who borrowed $12,000 for four years of college would save $650 over the typical 10-year repayment period, based on projections of T-bill rates.

Students who refinance their loans could get lower interest rates if they apply before Jan. 31, 1999.

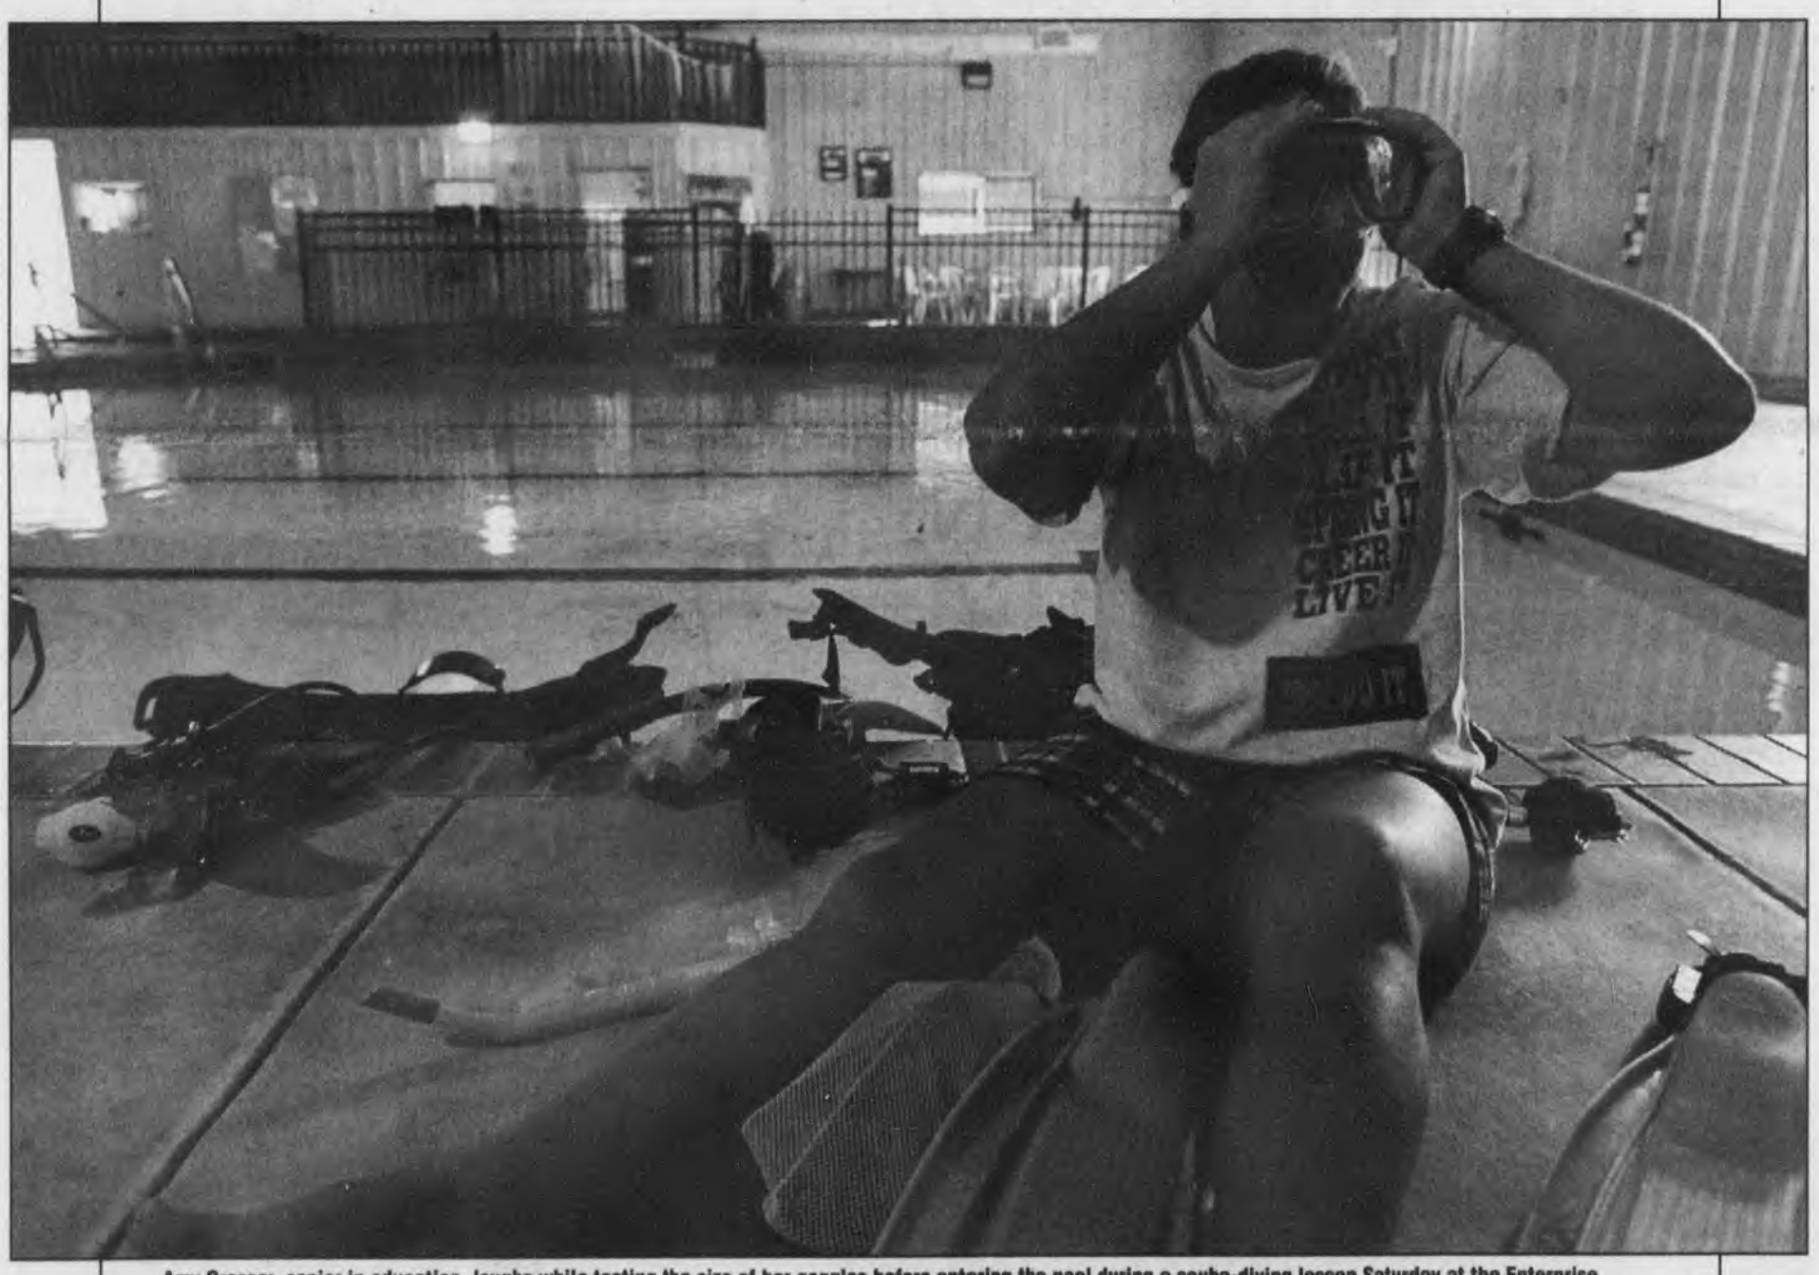
The measure also raises the maximum authorized amount for Pell Grants from the present $3,000 to $4,500 a year in 1999-2000, and to $5,800 in 2003-2004.

Congress would have to provide the money.

A yet-to-be passed House spending bill for education raises the grant amount to $3,150 in the budget year starting Oct. 1.

Past spending bills have raised the amount from $2,470 in 1996 to $3,000 this year.

The bill calls for the Education Department's student loan operations to be converted to a businesslike enterprise with a chief operating officer exempt from civil-service protections. The Department of Education also would gather and publish information on college costs.



Nearly 9 million students receive close to $49 billion in student financial assistance, and the numbers are expected to grow as more people attend college.

The bill also authorizes, for the first time, $300 million to improve teacher training and quality, including incentives for new teachers to have a major in the subject they teach and school districts to ensure that more teachers teach only the subjects they had studied. Two years' worth of student loans would be forgiven for people who teach in poor urban or rural districts.

The bill also would do the following:

- Permit university officials to tell parents if their child violated laws or school policies on drug abuse and deny aid to students with drug convictions.
- Require colleges to keep daily crime logs and open the reports to public inspection.
- Expand the list of possible hate crimes that must be reported to such crimes as arson, burglary, car theft and weapons possession. Crimes because of gender or disability would be added.
- Provide voter registration materials to students.

AQUATIC EXPERIENCES

Amy Grasser, senior in education, laughs while testing the size of her goggles before entering the pool during a scuba-diving lesson Saturday at the Enterprise, Kan., Municipal Pool. Scuba instructor Allen Shelton said the goggles should be tight enough to stay put, but they shouldn't cut into the diver's face. Shelton, a former police officer, now owns Aggie Dive Shop.

Scuba class to help students in job, travel

Reaching the ocean floor is an attainable goal through scuba-diving classes taught by scuba instructors in the Manhattan area.

K-State students have the opportunity to take scuba classes through the Professional Association of Dive Instructors for college credit. Students learn the necessary skills to travel elsewhere and dive.

"That is the neat thing about Manhattan — it is such a mobile community," said David Garvin, master scuba diver and owner of Creative Travel and Scuba.

Students take the class for a variety of reasons. Kimberly Wiss, senior in psychology, said she enrolled with the intent that it would help her obtain a future job in the marine-animal field.

"It is not required for psychology but is for some of the jobs that I want," Wiss said. "It just opens up a lot of jobs in the field. That, and it is a lot of fun."

Matt McClung, junior in marketing, is taking the class in preparation for a family trip this winter.

"I am doing it because other people in my family can do it, and we are taking a trip to the Caribbean," McClung said.

Architecture graduate wins top fellowship

By AMANDA EWING
Kansas State Collegian

For the fourth consecutive year and the sixth time since 1991, a graduate of K-State's College of Architecture, Planning and Design has been awarded the Skidmore, Owings and Merrill Traveling Fellowship.

Anders Henningson, a May 1998 graduate, won the $10,000 fellowship.

Henningson's proposal for the SOM Fellowship was to learn how Scandinavian architects who studied in the Mediterranean region made the transition from the intense light of the Mediterranean to the low light of Scandinavia. He is in Stockholm, Sweden, conducting his research.

Henningson's nomination was based partly on the quality of his work while at K-State, as well as his work ethic and maturity.

"Anders stood out primarily because of the quality of his design work," said Mark Shapiro, head of the Department of Architecture. "He had shown a kind of consistency in development and maturation over the years in his design work."

Shapiro said the prestigious award, which is given to a graduating student, provides a wonderful experience for the winner.

"It allows the student to continue their education through travel, which is a fantastic opportunity," Shapiro said.

The SOM Fellowship, which has been awarded for more than 15 years, is one of the top architectural awards in the country. K-State is the only undergraduate program to have won the award more than twice.

"To have won five out of the past six years is phenomenal," said Dennis Law, dean of the college. "No other program comes close to it."

Only Columbia, Harvard and Yale have won more SOM Fellowship awards, and those were in the gradu-

Federal Reserve cuts interest rate

■ Stock prices plunge by 100 after announcement by the Fed.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Federal Reserve moved to inoculate the U.S. economy against a spreading global crisis Tuesday, cutting a key interest rate for the first time in nearly three years.

The quarter-point cut in the federal-funds rate to 5.25 percent will mean slightly lower borrowing costs for millions of Americans on everything from auto loans to home-equity lines of credit.

Norwest Corp., a large regional bank based in Minneapolis, Minn., was the first to announce a cut in its prime lending rate, lowering it from 8.5 percent to 8.25 percent, effective immediately. Other banks were expected to follow.

Wall Street, which had hoped for a bigger rate cut, sent stock prices plunging by more than 100 points after the Fed announcement but later recovered somewhat. The Dow Jones industrial average ended the day down 28.32 at 8,080.52. The bond market did rally on the news, with Treasury's benchmark 30-year bond falling to a record low of 5.09 percent.

Congressional critics, however, complained that the Fed still is reacting too slowly to the threats posed to American manufacturers and farmers by lost foreign markets.

"America and the rest of the world needs stronger action by the Federal Reserve," Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, said. "The weakening of foreign economies is dragging down the U.S. economy."

Consumer confidence falls for 3rd month

NEW YORK — Shaken by global economic and political turmoil, Americans' confidence in the U.S. economy fell in September for the third straight month.

The Conference Board reported Tuesday that its index of consumer confidence fell 7.1 points to 126 in September from a revised 133.1 in August.

The index is down 12.2 points from its 29-year high in June.

September's decline was larger than Wall Street analysts had expected and the biggest monthly drop since January. It brings the index to its lowest level since October 1997.

"We are beginning to see the financial ails of others arrive at the shores of the U.S., and that will result in some degree of slowing of the economy," said Dan Seto, an economist at Nikko Securities International Co. "Consumers realize this, and they are just becoming a bit more cautious."

The report comes amid increasing signs of a slowing U.S. economy as a result of the economic crises in Asia and Russia, which are now threatening to spread to Latin America.

On Tuesday, the Federal Reserve cut short-term interest rates by a quarter-percentage point — the first reduction in nearly three years — in hopes of cushioning the U.S. economy against the financial turmoil.

Consumer confidence is an important economic indicator because consumer spending accounts for two-thirds of the nation's overall economic activity.

In the Conference Board report, fewer Americans said they would buy a car or a large appliance in coming months.

The consumer confidence index, started in 1967, is compiled from responses to questions sent to 5,000 households nationwide.

Youths drink but use designated drivers

CHICAGO — A survey of teen drinking found good and bad news — more than half of youth ages 16 to 19 said they drank during the preceding month but nearly two-thirds said they always appoint a designated driver.

Still, even the good news in Tuesday's study had a twist: 80 percent said they thought it's fine to drink as long as there is a designated driver and nearly half said they thought designated drivers still can drink.

"We're not impressing on kids the fact that getting drunk can be dangerous," said Richard Heyman, a Cincinnati pediatrician and chairman of the substance-abuse committee at the American Academy of Pediatrics, which released the study.

The results mirror a much larger government-supported study of 51,000 high school students released in December.

The telephone survey has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Both surveys found teens generally drink to get drunk. Fifty-one percent said they consume between two and five drinks at a sitting.

"They don't stand around like an adult with their beer in their hand at a cocktail party. They take a six-pack," Heyman said. "They are mind-altering drinkers."

Findings include the following:

■ Sixty-one percent said they'd consumed alcohol within the preceding month.

■ Nearly a third mistakenly said they thought a can of beer is less intoxicating than a shot of vodka.

■ Boys and girls average about the same number of drinking days a month — 5.6 days and 5.2 days, respectively. Boys are more likely than girls to have had six or more drinks in the preceding month — 32 percent vs. 22 percent.

■ The average age when drinking begins is 14.

■ Sixty-four percent said they avoid drunken driving by always appointing a designated driver when drinking with friends.

■ Eighty percent said they thought it's OK to drink with friends as long as there is a designated driver.

In-line skaters, bikers to show skills at Union

K-State will have its own mini-version of ESPN2's "Extreme Sports" Thursday.

The Details Magazine and Aggressive Skaters Association "Hooked Up" College Tour 1998 will appear from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. on the northeast lawn of the K-State Student Union.

There will be professional in-line skaters and a BMX bike rider performing on a customized half-pipe event area.

In addition to interactive skating, there will be free samples and demonstrations of tour sponsors' products. Some of the sponsors this year include Hyundai, L'Oréal and Sony PlayStation.

"We do not know exactly what products they will be bringing," said Tena Stoller, special events coordinator for the K-State Union Bookstore.

The bookstore, on-campus sponsor of the event, also will be having specials in conjunction with the tour stop. The tour is produced by MarketSource Corporation, a marketing service company.

"Their goal is to bring people in by providing entertainment and promotional products of interest and benefit to the students," Stoller said.

This is the second year the tour has come to K-State.

"Nobody knew about it last year, but a lot of people showed up," said Patrice Campbell, sophomore in pre-optometry and bookstore employee, who is helping Stoller coordinate the event.

Campbell said she saw the tour last year, liked it and told people to go see it. She said they are trying to promote the event more in hopes that even more students will attend.

"You can't miss it," Campbell said.

Security tape catches boys harassing girls

FORT WORTH, Texas — A school bus security camera recorded middle school boys groping girls and engaging in simulated sex that apparently went unheeded by the bus driver.

Seven students, ages 12 to 15, from Forest Oak Middle School were suspended for their actions seen on the videotape. Four of those are being investigated for possible indecency, the Fort Worth Star-Telegram reported Tuesday.

The videotape of the Sept. 15 incident showed disturbing scenes of boys groping girls' breasts, holding the girls down and simulating sex acts. In one case, a boy wrapped his legs around the girls' heads.

"These kids are out of control," police Sgt. Jeff Valmores said. "One of these little girls says every day this goes on."

The video also shows one boy being struck by a rock and appearing to be in pain as other children lie face down in the aisle and seats to avoid getting hit by flying debris. Several punches also are thrown.

A school liaison police officer watched the video and identified the seven suspects. The officer also identified three victims, ages 12 and 13.

Valmores said that when the boys were confronted, they denied doing anything.

Storms cause outages on campus Tuesday

A lightning strike to a transformer at the intersection of Denison and Anderson avenues was the cause of power outages across campus Tuesday night, K-State Police said.

The lightning strike, which caused power outages from Nichols Hall and the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art to the Strong and Derby complexes, left many on-campus residents in the dark.

Students lit candles and carried flashlights through the hallways of Ford Hall. Some, whose studies were interrupted by the power outage, resorted to sitting beneath the emergency floodlights to continue their work.

Several students were riding in elevators at the time of the blackout.

"We were sharing an elevator with two other girls and all of a sudden, the lights went out, and the elevator stopped moving, and everyone started screaming, and the two other girls decided to start singing, so, we started singing gospel songs and whatnot," Jeff Saale, freshman in sociology, said.

Many were forced to wait for maintenance crews to come and get them, while Saale managed to leave on his own.

"I pried open one of the doors and we were in between two floors ... I was just fiddling with the little levers on our side of the doors, and I was just pushing it one way and another, and I held it on one side, and it pulled open the other door ... and we probably had 2 1/2 feet from the top of their floor to the bottom of our elevator, and we just kinda shimmied out tried not to fall down the elevator chute," Saale said.

Campus police said the power would be restored as soon as KPL Gas Service could make repairs.

The U.S. Cavalry Museum is one of Fort Riley's main visitor attractions with nearly 70,000 visitors last year. Along with the museum, the Custer House Historic Site and the First Territorial Capitol are also important tourist sites at Fort Riley.

Fort Riley mixes history, modern sites

By TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Scott Price came to Fort Riley 12 years ago as a soldier. When it was time to retire, he didn't want to leave.

"There are certain things money can't buy, and it was important that we stay here," Price, Fort Riley community relations officer, said.

Price said Fort Riley's location near Interstate 70 puts it at the crossroads of America. He said Cub Scouts, senior citizen groups and veteran organizations are a large part of the 85,000 people who visited Fort Riley last year.

"If you stack up 85,000 visitors, that's going to compare with some of the more trafficked sites in the state," he said.

Fort Riley is a mixture of its historic past and contemporary function, Price said.

Soldiers have been stationed at Fort Riley since it was established in 1852, when the area was known as the Territory of Nebraska. Fort Riley was built to protect the country's expansion into the unknown West.

Price said the fort combines modern facilities with many historic sites. He said there are 221 historic sites in an 11-foot-square-acre area.

"This is one of the most heavily concentrated areas of buildings in a historic district in the United States," he said.

The most visited tourist attractions at Fort Riley are the U.S. Cavalry Museum, the Custer House Historic Site and the First Territorial Capitol.

Bill McHale, U.S. Cavalry Museum specialist, said architectural styles at Fort Riley also attract many visitors. He said the U.S. Cavalry Museum had nearly 70,000 visitors last year.

"The romance and the mystique of the American Cavalry attracts people," he said. "I'm not sure about your generation, but I'm 49, and my generation was brought up with TV westerns. It's that John Wayne genre."

McHale said Fort Riley visitors get an appreciation of the army and how it protects national interests around the world.

"By coming to Fort Riley, people can form a better understanding of what the army has done in contributing to the settlement of America," he said.

Settling the country and fighting for its interests meant soldiers had to be prepared for battle. Fort Riley was a trench warfare training center during World War I. The training trenches were discovered at Fort Riley after burning the prairie three years ago.

John Dendy, with the Directorate of Environment and Safety, said the trenches were a realistic experience for soldiers on their way overseas.

"They literally had the experience they would have if they were fighting in the war," he said.

The trenches went virtually unharmed over the years, which Dendy attributes to the hard clay soil and the prairie's quick recovery speed. The trenches have been filled in by natural processes, but the zigzag characteristics of the trenches are still visible.

They cover an area of about eight to 10 square acres.

"With the zigzags, they are a lot bigger than they look," Dendy said.

Fort Riley is also in need of volunteers for its Custer House Historic Site, which Price said is one of its biggest attractions. Although being a tour guide is not part of his job, he sometimes gives tours so visitors are able to see the site.

Without assistance, Price said the number of tours might have to be limited.

"The bottom line is that kids would not be able to go into the Custer House," he said. "That history belongs to everyone in Kansas."

The history is something Price said he does not want to part with anytime soon — he has no plans of leaving to miss the future of Fort Riley.

"If you close your eyes at sunset and dream, it's very easy to picture yourself back there with the horse soldiers," he said. "It's a unique place. There's nothing like it."

Union Bookstore celebrates books, freedom of speech

By JAMI STUMP
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Literary works such as "Of Mice and Men" and "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn" are challenged and banned continually for their content that some people consider inappropriate for young readers.

The K-State Union Bookstore and the KSU Libraries' Multicultural Research and Resource Center are celebrating Banned Book Week this week, in observance of literary freedom.

From 12:30 to 1:30 p.m. for the rest of the week in the bookstore, students and community members will read sections from challenged books.

Beverly Evans, Union Bookstore general book buyer, said Banned Book Week focuses on the importance of First Amendment rights and emphasizes the power of literature.

"Reading is important, and who is to say what a person can or cannot read?" Evans said.

All of the banned books are available for 25 percent off this week in the bookstore.

English professor Greg Eiselein read several pieces of poetry Monday. He said there are several reasons why books are banned and challenged.

"Books are banned because of fear or the feeling of being threatened," Eiselein said. "Other times, people think they are doing good because they are keeping the books out of the hands of young children.

"Ignorance is another reason. A person may hear that such and such a book is bad and may not read it for themselves to form an opinion," he said.

As a teacher, Eiselein said he thought it's better to let students read the books for themselves.

"Only the reader can form an opinion," he said.

He said what some people might think is an immoral book might be a classic to others.

Jill Stafford, junior in agricultural economics, said she doesn't agree with banning books. She said many of the challenged books can teach valuable lessons.

"I have enjoyed several books that are considered challenged in school," Stafford said. "Those books are so deep, and they teach about people and their characters. Books should not be banned because it all depends on the maturity of the audience and reader."

Michele Perrier, junior in biology, said she supports Banned Book Week to promote literary freedom.

"I think it's wonderful that K-State is so open-minded and possesses a worldly attitude toward free speech," she said.

KSU PARKING SERVICES
108 Edwards Hall 532-PARK (7275)

Many times individuals ask Parking Services personnel...

- How is the money spent?
- Where does all the money go?
- Why are parking permits so high?

This column will try to answer those questions and future articles will inform you of revenue source(s).

The Department of Parking Services receives no funds or tax dollars from the State. All the money received to operate that parking program is received from the individuals who use the lots. The fee schedules are approved by the KSU Administrative Council.

EXPENDITURES:

Salaries (includes three Police positions and two Facilities positions)	$417,113.34
Salaries, Students	158,154.47
Repairs & Maintenance	122,043.46
Travel	1,152.22
Printing (maps, regulations, etc.)	18,570.17
Professional Fees (consultant, snow contract institutional support, KP&L)	114,226.60
Telephone	10,993.13
Maintenance Materials (signs, paint, posts)	43,172.77

Loan Payments	250,086.12
Total Expenditures	$1,941,772.71

Note: Not all expenditures listed as some were very small but total includes them.

Last year, Parking Services spent approximately $250,000 to rebuild the Marlatt Hall lot which included new lights, a security camera, and landscaping. Another $250, 000 was spent in other lots to do major repairs of cracks, pot holes, dumpster damage and snow removal curb damages.

The expenditures in FY 98 exceeded revenues by $284,587.22. In FY 97, revenues exceeded expenditures by $251, 019.37.

OUR VIEW

Banned Book Week should be embraced

The free expression of thoughts and ideas is a right.

We are in the midst of Banned Book Week, a week where we recognize that sometimes our freedom of expression is fragile. It is a right we have fought hard to win, and it is a right we continually fight hard to protect. The Boston Tea Party was free expression. The Civil Rights march on Washington was free expression. The two men who came to the free-speech zone behind the K-State Student Union last week to tell us about the wages of sin were exercising their right to free expression, too; despite the fact they were not made to feel very welcome.

Technically, your right to criticize the two men is free expression.

When this delicate freedom evades us, we get censorship. Censorship happens when former Alabama Gov. George Wallace tries to prevent certain students from going to school because of their skin color. It happens when police meet striking workers with tear gas and billy clubs. It happens when people who want to address students in the free-speech zone need to get permission from Anderson Hall before they can spread their message.

Censorship also happens when books are banned or challenged; when a book is taken out of the hands of anyone who would read it. It is a mischievous ill that society has, and one that gives people the desire to tell others what they can and cannot read. In certain situations, we find it to be completely appropriate to suppress information — war is one example — and yet, in other, more peaceful times, we find this suppression abhorrent.

The fact is books often are written as statements about society at certain times. What might be appropriate on one occasion is not necessarily deemed appropriate in the next. "Oedipus Rex," the Greek tragedy whose main character kills his father out of lust for his own mother, is regarded as being much more mainstream than the movie "Lolita," a story whose main character marries a woman out of lust for her 14-year-old daughter.

While we might find the idea of banning books such as "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn" and "Of Mice and Men" objectionable, and we might say banning books is bad and never could be allowed by today's society, we forget it was only 1994 when the Olathe School District was sued by the American Civil Liberties Union for banning the book "Annie on My Mind" from its libraries. "Annie on My Mind" had stood on shelves in Olathe since the mid 1980s, but was removed once concerned parents discovered its content.

The book was about a relationship between two women. In the end, the controversy brought more attention to "Annie on My Mind" and to gay issues than any other event potentially could have.

We do not need to be shoving these issues under the rug. Often, books are banned because they highlight relevant social issues, and because sometimes they hit too close to home. Even books banned for profanity and obscenity often have value far beyond the appropriateness of their language. It is important to read the books we celebrate this week. It is important because we are at K-State to learn, and these books represent the pinnacle of exposure to new ideas. We shouldn't be shoving these issues under the rug. We should be embracing them.

Is there a threshold, though? Are there books that should not be read — that are too dangerous to see the light of day? Certainly, if that is the case, they would need to be written very well. Content alone is not going to destabilize society. However, we are faced with a freedom that requires responsibility. We need to decide for ourselves what is art and what is not art. We want to contribute to humanity. We don't want to crush it.

But how do we know what will or will not contribute to humanity? Books such as "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn" are no longer banned because society has matured to accept them. You would not give a second-grader a book written for a high school audience, because they would not have the maturity to understand. Perhaps, with some books and topics, we are still on the second-grade level. If that is the case, the authors of banned or challenged books are way ahead of their time.

That is why we should embrace them.

From 12:30 to 1:30 p.m. this week the Union Bookstore is having people read from banned books; go and learn.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. The editorial board consists of Collegian editors and other staff members. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

CONVERSATIONS ON THE STUDENT LEVEL

Why campus discussion no longer serves the student interest

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

It seems death has finally come for intelligent campus discussion.

It is not a pretty sight, by any means. I think it actually died two years ago; by now, the advanced stages of rigor mortis are upon us.

The lingering aura of true discussion of important issues now only resurfaces in threadbare symbols — such as Silver Key Sophomore Honorary's farcical "homeless" sleep-out or a Union Program Council forum on some issue or another attended by a handful of bored students.

It's difficult to imagine any student leader in these dull times as actually feeling passion toward anything, albeit election. And as the past few years have proved, that is what is most on the minds of a vast majority of student leaders throughout campus. It's no comfort to think re-election is the underlying thrust of many campaigns for state office. Goals, anyone?

Student Body President Tracey Mann has much work to do to restore some dignity to his office. There has been no distinct agenda in the executive branch since Jeff Peterson's "Access the Future," and that was in 1995. What has been passed off as leadership since has had more to do with petty politics and behind-the-scenes maneuvering that, incidentally, contributes nothing to campus discussion. We students have yet to move forward, beyond 1995.

But it's not solely Student Governing Association's responsibility to encourage discussion. Why have college councils, residence hall associations, student general-interest organizations, honor societies or campus cultural institutions if not for the generation of ideas that contribute to the college experience?

Truthfully, the majority of these so-called student organizations have positioned themselves nicely as lobbyists who are uninterested in campus discussion unless it somehow benefits them. Instead of working with other groups, many of these organizations and their members are self-motivated by ambitious thoughts of power résumés, pats on the back by well-placed administrators, and the mirage of true leadership. That argument, at least from me, is as old as the hills. But, now and then, someone has to step forward and deflate a few egos.

True leadership is never bestowed on someone only because they are president of some unheard-of organization. It's when that organization decides to contribute ideas — not publicity events — to campus that some semblance of leadership can begin to form. Of course, only a paucity of examples of this kind of leadership exist at K-State now.

You might be asking why any campus discussion on anything is even necessary. Why can't we all just trudge through our academic life, ignorant of the institution to which we belong, which we financially support and which trades on our successes to lure yet more students to fill our places?

Campus discussion is an absolute necessity for growth and for this contemporary student body to improve on past bodies. It is the job of leaders to bring forth ideas and concepts and hurl them into the public arena. Once there, it is the role of the student body to dissect these ideas, to support them or to denounce them. Some might say it's the role of the campus journalist to help disseminate these ideas and for the critic to bring new insight to the table.

Perhaps Ada Louise Huxtable, the mother of modern architecture critics, said it best when it comes to critical discussion. In 1970 she wrote, "Critics are not by nature existentialists; if they accepted things as they are, they would be in some other business. But only mock philosophers pretend to provide answers for the questions they raise; the purpose is to provoke thought and the possibility of solutions."

She is speaking as a journalist, not as a leader. In her own way, however, she became a leader with strong convictions and an advocacy of what she viewed as important topics in need of discussion.

Maybe K-State's leadership shortcomings exist because we have few critics on campus. The K-State student is not taught to question authority or attack traditions that might have outlived any contemporary use. The student has become too polite, too blasé toward issues not immediate. And, like the mouse paralyzed by the scorpion's sting, the student stares off to the horizon with no awareness of the figurative scorpion's dinner plans. Insert evil campus entity as scorpion and repeat as necessary.

Is the sun rising above this academic desert bringing forth students willing to set agendas, willing to have enemies?

As long as the bright, shiny objects of a football season and a presidential scandal dominate student interest, don't bet on it.

Being an 'agricultural school' not necessarily degrading

VIEWPOINT

JASON RUCKER

Silo-tech, K-S-Moo — we've all heard the derogatory terms aimed at our university's agricultural background. Some students love to perpetuate this stereotype by wearing straw hats, overalls, no shirts, no shoes and by sucking on corn-cob pipes at televised football games. I previously had attributed this to my theory that TV cameras actually suck IQ points from members of the public within a 50-foot radius.

For years, I was annoyed by the stereotype of K-State students and Kansans in general as farmers. I hated that some people chose to legitimize the stereotype with their big-game garb. However, I've begun to see the error of my ways.

Agriculture is by no means something to be ashamed of being associated with. Though agricultural work is not glamorous, it is the backbone of civilization. Most of you likely have heard this statement before. I had dismissed it as propaganda to bolster support for agricultural programs, but I've come to realize that it's the plain and simple truth.

What is one thing all people have in common? We all have to eat. Regardless of your dietary choices, what you eat comes from farmers. This seems rather trivial until you consider that agriculture is what allows civilization to exist. If you are not required to spend several hours each day seeking, gathering and preparing food to survive, you have time to pursue other things.

Without agriculture no one would have had time to develop construction, medicines, electricity or cars. People have had the luxury of time to investigate whatever part of the world intrigues them, because someone else did the work necessary to provide them with a ready source of food. If you're starving, you can't be very productive.

In the late 1800s, a farm worker produced enough food and fiber for himself and two other people. You've all seen the signs that say "One Kansas farmer produces enough food to feed himself and 104 other people." The figure varies, but the significance is the same. Less than 3 percent of U.S. citizens are active in agriculture, leaving the other 97 percent to make our nation the productive powerhouse that it is.

As agriculture has grown more efficient, the world has blossomed. So the people responsible are treated with the highest regard! Oh no wait, I guess we treat farmers like the dirt they work in.

Is it just me or does this seem to lack logic? Why are farmers looked upon in such a negative light?

The only answer I could come up with is society's view of education as a badge of worth. We view doctors and lawyers very highly. Why? They must be smart, they went to school for nearly a decade. Does this mean intelligence determines a person's worth? Some people would argue so. Does a long academic career necessarily mean a person is more intelligent than someone who did not go to school as long? Clearly not, it just means a person has been presented with more information in an academic setting.

The modern farmer is no fool. Many of them have college degrees. The increasing efficiency of agriculture has been in large part due to technological advances, and thus farmers must understand the technology they are utilizing. Farmers spend a lot of time learning outside of a classroom.

It's interesting that farmers most frequently are looked down upon by the people who need them most, those who live in cities. If several million people had to gather their own food in an area of only a few hundred square miles, mostly laid over with concrete, it wouldn't take long before everyone would starve or be forced to move to less densely populated areas.

So perhaps being labeled an agricultural school isn't such a bad thing after all. Without us no other schools could exist. Those downtrodden folks to the east wouldn't have an institution to mock us from. Agriculture is of the utmost importance to everyone, whether they recognize it or not. Farmers have done long ago the work necessary to make them worthy of our respect.

It's time we gave it to them.

K-State students, alumni profit from starting own businesses

BY NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Owning a small business requires no degree, only initiative.

Several K-State students have or are in the process of opening their own businesses, and they did it with K-State's help.

Tanner Mason, senior in marketing and international business, sells shirts on the Internet. Dave Dreiling is the owner of It's Greek to Me Inc. Each make tough decisions daily that affect their businesses.

Mason is starting The Shirt Company, which sells T-shirts from bars around the country over the Internet. His company has a variety of clients including Porter's in Aggieville.

Mason said he can't remember where he got the idea for the business.

"I am not sure if I was at a bar or if it just popped into my head," Mason said. "I always had ideas; it was just a matter of acting on them."

As a business owner, Mason spends a lot of time doing the minuscule tasks that make a business work. Tasks that include registering his URL, or Web address, filling out tax forms and talking with representatives.

"Lately I have been spending a lot of time talking to Fed-Ex representatives as well as UPS comparing prices," Mason said.

Mason is working with a Web developer deciding the style and content of his page. However, he said he doesn't know where the business will take him.

"I really don't know what to expect," Mason said.

Fred Rice, director of the Small Business Development Center, has worked with Mason and said his success will be determined by a variety of things.

"His success will lie in how much he buys a shirt for and how much he can charge for it," Rice said.

Rice, a small business adviser, counsels potential owners on a variety of topics when he meets with them.

"Our first thing is don't laugh at them," Rice said. "Let them know that every dream has a time and a place. The question is, 'Is this the right time and place?'"

Rice's clients fill out a cash flow projection chart for the first three years of business.

"If a cash flow projection of the first three years of business doesn't show a profit, we suggest they forget it," Rice said.

Part of Rice's job is helping clients develop ideas, he said. Rice helps potential small business owners improve their business ideas and plans. He said he felt a business has to be product-driven.

"Nike had a Tiger Woods line and couldn't sell the stuff," Rice said. "Now if Sammy Sosa has the same line, it might be successful."

Rice said sometimes a business can create a need for a product.

"Occasionally a company can find a fad that beats the market and really cream them," Rice said. "The biggest question is — is the product driven?"

For Dreiling, owner of It's Greek To Me, the answer was yes.

In 1989 as a K-State student and social chairman of Phi Delta Theta fraternity, Dreiling said he believed he could improve the way fraternities buy clothes. So he bought into It's Greek To Me two years after its inception, and has since become the sole owner.

It's Greek To Me has more than 100 employees on staff and a line of products sold nationwide by sales representatives.

"We pre-produce the product for our sales crew, which travels around the U.S. selling products," Dreiling said.

Dreiling, like Mason, said he didn't know what to expect from the business when it began.

"I really didn't know where it would go," Dreiling said. "I knew where it could go, but when I first started it was nothing other than greek wear."

Now the store has expanded to four different areas of sales nationwide, which include high school apparel and retail sales.

"I saw the opportunities in other markets and felt that it would be good to diversify," Dreiling said.

Last year, It's Greek To Me had a successful fiscal year, Dreiling said.

"We had excess sales this year in excess of $5 million," he said.

Farm aid package upsets Democrats

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Democratic farm state senators, angered by the size of a $4.1 billion Republican-backed farm aid package, pledged Tuesday to fight for more "as long as it takes."

"We're going to fight like heck," said Sen. Paul Wellstone, D-Minn.

Democrats said they will move to send the GOP proposal back to committee until Republicans add more money.

"We will stay here as long as it takes," Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., said. "This matter will be resolved."

Still, it is uncertain how successful the Democrats' efforts will be. They were unable to muster the votes to get their $7.3 billion farm aid proposal out of a House-Senate agriculture conference committee Monday night.

Instead, Republicans, negotiating the overall agricultural spending bill, kept their own plan despite the threat of a presidential veto.

Rep. Bob Livingston, R-La., chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, warned GOP leaders against increasing funding for the aid package.

"We ought to draw the line. We ought to say 'no more,'" Livingston said in the meeting Monday night. "The fact is, $4 billion is not a thimble full of money."

In other farm news Tuesday, Taiwanese officials announced their country will purchase up to $1.15 billion worth of U.S. grain next year.

Officials signed letters indicating Taiwan will buy up to 7.5 million metric tons of wheat, soybeans, corn, sorghum and barley in six states, including Kansas.

Republicans have been opposed to the centerpiece of the Democratic aid package — a one-year boost in rates on commodity marketing loans that would trigger an estimated $5 billion in government payments to growers. With the marketing loan program, farmers can take either a payment for the difference between crop prices and loan rates or borrow money at the loan rate and repay it at the crop's value.

Republicans have charged that the proposal is an attempt to return to the days before the 1996 farm law when farm subsidies were directly tied to crop production.

Nixon, Clinton cases could be handled similarly

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — House Republicans are weighing a plan to give the Judiciary Committee virtually the same open-ended authority for investigating President Clinton that the panel had during its impeachment inquiry for Richard Nixon a quarter-century ago, GOP sources said Tuesday.

The disclosure came as Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott cautioned that recent sharp Democratic criticism of GOP handling of the impeachment review "undercuts everything" — including the possibility of an eventual plea-bargain that would punish the president but fall short of impeachment.

Among House Republicans, sources who spoke on condition of anonymity said no final decisions have been made about the precise mandate the panel will receive if, as expected, the House votes to establish an impeachment inquiry next week.

CLINTON

The Nixon panel in 1974 received authority to "investigate fully and completely whether sufficient grounds exist for the House of Representatives to exercise its constitutional power to impeach" the president.

Presenting such a proposal for consideration would enable Republicans to expand their inquiry well beyond Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's evidence concerning Clinton's affair with Monica Lewinsky. It would open the door, for example, into other areas such as alleged fund-raising violations during the president's 1996 re-election campaign.

At the same time, it would pose a dilemma to Democrats who are arguing the inquiry should be limited to Starr's evidence, yet are insisting the House follow a set of standards that guided the committee in 1974.

Crew team earns 3 medals in Des Moines tourney

Despite victories, varsity team needs improvement, Coach Jenny Hale says

By SARAH CRAIG
Kansas State Collegian

Technical difficulties and timing challenged the women's crew team last weekend at the Head of the Des Moines meet. The varsity team earned a silver medal in the eight-boat competition, while the novice team took home gold medals in both the eight- and four-boat races.

Coach Jenny Hale said she was pleased with the novices but saw some areas needing improvement on the varsity level.

"The team is still working on finding the right combinations of rowers for each boat," Hale said. "I think we have a lot of work to do as far as getting the right lineups and getting the right eight people in the boats.

"It was a pretty good, solid performance, but at the varsity level, we've got a long way to go."

The second-place eight-boat finished with a time of 17:25, which placed it behind Iowa, the team K-State has set as a goal to defeat. The Hawkeye's time was 17:09.

The varsity four-boat would have placed third in its competition; however, a technical difficulty gave it a one-minute penalty that pushed it back to eighth place.

Senior rower Sara Swan said she felt these problems would improve with time.

"This was definitely a learning meet, kind of a stepping stone for the rest of the season," Swan said.

"I think from here we can try to build the boats. Now, we're just trying to get all the things together."

Timing is key in rowing, an area senior Tracy Stockebrand said would improve as the team became better adjusted to each boat member.

"We need to work on getting our oars in the water as quickly as possible and driving back right away," Stockebrand said.

"I think those things are going to come in the next few weeks."

As rowing continues to become a more prominent sport in Kansas, Hale said the ability and skill levels of the incoming rowers has been improving.

"I was really pleased with the novices. They showed a lot of potential and heart," Hale said.

The next competition for K-State is the prestigious Head of the Charles, where 50 teams compete. The goal for this meet is to finish in the top 20. Last year, the team placed 31st.

One varsity eight-boat will attend this meet.

"The goal is to be in the top 20, but again, we have a considerable amount of work to do between now and then," Hale said.

The team is striving now to improve on various timing and technical issues and to find the right combination of people for each boat. According to the rowers, this will be just a matter of time and practice.

"I just hope that Coach Hale puts us in boats where we can row with the same people," Stockebrand said.

"Once we get into boats that are settled that will help a little, and then we can get focused on what we need as a boat."

By the next meet, Swan said the team's goal is to have a strong boat that is working well together.

"I think by the Head of the Charles we'll have a boat that's set and that will have been rowing together," she said.

Frank Murphy stretches before a spring 1998 football practice at the outdoor practice fields near Frank Myers Field. Murphy has finished his four-game suspension handed down by the NCAA for the acceptance of money from boosters and will be eligible to play against Colorado on Oct. 10.

WAITING GAME

Running back's 4-game suspension complete

By JOHN BERGGREN
Kansas State Collegian

Though the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is caught in the middle of a waiting game, Frank Murphy's wait is over.

Murphy finished the final game of a four-game suspension handed down by the NCAA for the acceptance of money from boosters, Saturday against Northeast Louisiana. The athletic department, however, is awaiting a decision, on an appeal to the NCAA Committee on Infractions that ruled K-State is in "major" violation of NCAA rules after self-reporting the incident.

Murphy accepted $200 from a booster prior to his recruitment by K-State and another $3,200 from a group of nine Garden City area boosters for the purchase of an automobile after signing with the Wildcats.

The athletic department took its appeal to the NCAA on Sunday in Atlanta, Ga., hoping to get the "major" violation reduced to a "minor" one in stature. The NCAA will make its decision in the next four to six weeks.

Coach Bill Snyder said in a Tuesday press conference that no indication was given on to how the NCAA might rule.

MURPHY

"They were very complimentary to our program and to our athletic department and to how the situation was handled," Snyder said. "But they were very guarded in regards to what direction they were going to go."

Meanwhile, Murphy is working hard in practice during K-State's bye week this week and will work hard next week to earn playing time against Colorado on Oct. 10.

"I think these two weeks will go a long way in regards to how much he'll play," Snyder said.

"I think he's ready to play, and I'm quite confident he will play.

"How much depends on his preparation this week and next week and how well he is able to handle the offense."

Murphy has not seen live-game action since transferring from Garden City Community College, where he gained 1,370 yards as a sophomore and was named National JuCo Player of the Year. Murphy also was picked as preseason newcomer of the year by the Big 12. His suspension, however, did not include practice, and facing K-State's No. 1 nationally ranked defense has kept him in game shape.

"He's lost all the opportunities to be on the field in game situations, and that means a lot," Snyder said. "But he's been involved with practices. We work him with our No. 1 offense and against our No. 1 defense, so he's played against a very competitive team."

Snyder said he could sense Murphy was ready in anticipation for a game that means something against Colorado.

"I'm sure his heart rate is a little higher than it has been this week," Snyder said.

"He's anxious, and he wants to be on the field, and he wants to help his team."

Columnist adds red, white to his Royal blues after Chicago wild card berth

VIEWPOINT

JON BALMER

I'll be the first to admit it, I'm not a diehard Cubs fan.

Sure, I could go out and purchase a Cubs hat, age it with a nice coat of dirt and claim I've kept it stored away with my "Harry Carey for president" banner, but I'll leave that for the rest of America's bandwagon.

My heart still resides in Kauffman Stadium, but Monday night, I cleared a little space on the Royals mantle for Chicago's favorite losers.

Granted, I've been keeping up with the Cubbies since I first flipped on WGN and witnessed the fishbowl-sized glasses of Harry Carey, and Sammy Sosa's antics renewed my belief in baseball.

It wasn't until Monday night, when the Cubs finally locked down a wild card berth after defeating San Francisco 5-3, that my love for the bad-news bears of the big leagues came full circle.

On a night when I should have been brushing up on my Spanish and preparing for an upcoming law exam, my undivided attention was captured by far more important things my professors would dare to label "trivial."

First glance: Cubs pitcher Steve Trachsel still has a no-hitter going into the fifth inning. Not too shabby, but mastering the Spanish language still prevails.

Second glance: Gary Gaetti, a former Royal and near-perfect replica of Kramer after one too many trips to Sirloin Stockade, sends a shot into left field, giving the Cubs first blood and a 2-0 lead in the fifth. Maybe Spanish isn't so important; after all, it's only spoken by half the Earth's population.

Third glance: Trachsel's still has no-hitter after the sixth inning, and Bill Murray's leading "Take Me Out to the Ball Game." I'll learn the rest of my Spanish from an old Menudo tape.

From this point on, it was a total abuse of educational time, and a blessed feast of baseball the way it should be.

Sosa never cleared the ivy, but he did score two runs, more than enough to secure his spot as Most Valuable Player.

Mark Grace, the grizzled veteran who played on the Cubs last trip to the postseason in 1989, summed up Chicago's drive after an eighth-inning double that brought Sosa home and put the Cubs up 5-0. Dusting himself off, Grace tapped his heart Sosa-like, signaling the dedication this season's Cubs have to erasing their comical, gut-wrenching past.

It wouldn't have been an official Cubs game without some late-inning dramatics. Staked to a five-run lead, Cubs manager Jim Riggleman went through three relievers and three Giants' runs before closer Rod Beck, with the massive handlebar mustache, finished the game by getting former-Series hero Joe Carter to pop-out.

Then, as they say, the floodgates opened.

Little bits of frustration began to chip away from Wrigley Field. A young fan brandished a "Harry's watching over us" sign. Sosa's dream of a postseason trip finally was realized.

It wasn't just the emotional floodgates of the Cubs that opened, however. It finally hit me why this team had captured my attention: So much of my family has ties to the Cubs and their painful history.

My great-grandfather, who passed away a short while ago, was 8 years old when the Cubs last tasted World Series victory in 1908.

A man who had lived 98 years on this planet to the fullest, my great-grandfather still stayed involved in my life until his time had come. Heck, the man knew Tostitos was the Fiesta Bowl sponsor when we spoke last Christmas.

If I ever needed a reference to history of the 1900s, he was the best source available.

The line doesn't end there, however. My father, a Chicagoan for a majority of his childhood, would often share his Wrigley Field adventures with me during an evening at a Royals game.

With tales ranging from the best way to catch a Cubs game for free to the Chicago legends he watched within the friendly confines, my father's eyes always sparkled when he discussed his Windy City days.

After this sudden dive into the family past, I realized it was my turn to experience the Cubs and their roller coaster legacy. Sure, their journey into the post-season probably will be a short-lived one, but I'll do everything within my disposal to enjoy the ride.

If that calls for a spontaneous road trip to Wrigley Field for Game 3 of the Cubs-Braves series Saturday, so be it.

Besides, I need a bobbing-head Sosa doll to start my Cubs collection.

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL PLAYOFF ROUNDUP

Yankees, Wells shutout Texas to take Game 1 of series

NEW YORK — David Wells delivered a perfect postseason start for the New York Yankees.

Playing their most important game in nearly six months, the Yankees looked every bit like the winningest team in AL history, beating the Texas Rangers 2-0 Tuesday night in Game 1 of their division series.

Wells pitched eight strong innings as the Yankees, who won their final seven games to finish with 114 victories, picked up exactly where they left off.

Wells, whose perfect game in May highlighted New York's dream year, improved to 5-0 in postseason action with the Yankees, Baltimore, Cincinnati and Toronto.

The left-hander gave up five hits and struck out nine. He kept Juan Gonzalez from hitting a ball out of the infield and escaped his only real jam by fanning Mike Simms to end the seventh with runners on first and second.

Mariano Rivera pitched a perfect ninth for a save as the Yankees won one month to the day they clinched a playoff spot in August.

Todd Stottlemyre nearly matched Wells, allowing just six hits and striking out eight for a complete game in front of his father, Mel, New York's pitching coach.

The Stottlemyre family affair surely created some anxious moments. The wives of both Mel and Todd sat in the Yankees' family section and did not hesitate to cheer when a New York runner was thrown out at the plate in the first inning.

When Todd won at Yankee Stadium last month — his fifth-straight victory at the ballpark where he grew up as a kid — his mother left her usual seat to sit with the Rangers' wives.

"I just wanted to be in this section this time," Jean Stottlemyre said.

The only controversial move made by Yankees manager Joe Torre paid off handsomely. Chad Curtis, whose defense earned him the start in left field ahead of fan favorites Darryl Strawberry and Shane Spencer, doubled to set up a two-run second inning.

With the crowd of 57,362 cheering, Scott Brosius hit an RBI single, and then the Yankees tricked Texas with Brosius getting caught in a run-down on a steal attempt while Curtis sneaked home.

Andy Pettitte (16-11), who struggled down the stretch, will start Game 2 tonight against Texas' Rick Helling (20-7) in the best-of-5 series.

Vaughn's 2 home runs lead Boston to 11-3 road victory

CLEVELAND — Mo Vaughn and the Red Sox stopped some painful postseason streaks.

Vaughn homered twice and tied a record with seven RBIs as Boston ended a 13-game postseason skid that began with Bill Buckner's infamous error, beating Cleveland 11-3 Tuesday in its AL playoff opener.

Nomar Garciaparra hit a three-run shot and Pedro Martinez pitched seven innings as Boston ended a slide that began on Oct. 25, 1986, when Mookie Wilson's grounder to first rolled through Buckner's legs at Shea Stadium.

That forced a World Series Game 7 the Red Sox lost, and Boston — which hasn't won the Series since 1918 — was swept by Oakland in 1988 and 1990 and then Cleveland in 1995.

This year's Red Sox said that the past is just that, and they're not cursed by Babe Ruth's ghost or any other demons. With Boston's trio of stars doing most of the damage, the Indians and 45,815 at Jacobs Field might believe them.

Vaughn — fittingly a first baseman — ended his own streak of playoff failure in the first inning with a three-run homer off Jaret Wright, sending Cleveland on to its worst loss in 55 postseason games. Vaughn had gone 0-for-14 with seven strikeouts in the 1995 Indians sweep.

After Garciaparra's three-run homer pushed the lead to 6-0 in the fifth, Vaughn connected for a two-run shot in the sixth off Doug Jones, becoming the first Boston player to hit two homers in a postseason game since Rico Petrocelli in the 1967 World Series.

Vaughn then delivered a two-run double in the eighth off Jim Poole to set a career-high for RBIs and tie Edgar Martinez's record for RBIs in a postseason game.

San Diego ace defeats Big Unit as Padres win 2-1 in Astrodome

HOUSTON — The Big Unit finally met his match in the Astrodome.

In a brilliant performance that would be expected more from 6-foot-10 Randy Johnson, San Diego's Kevin Brown struck out 16 and allowed just two hits in eight innings Tuesday, leading the Padres to a 2-1 victory over the Houston Astros in the opener of the best-of-5 division series.

Brown's strikeouts were the most ever in division series play and just one short of the Bob Gibson's postseason record of 17 in 1968 World Series.

Brown's previous high was 11, which he did three times in his final 11 regular-season starts.

Johnson had been practically untouchable at home, going 5-0 — the first four wins were shutouts — since the Astros acquired him from the Seattle Mariners on July 31.

Trevor Hoffman, who tied the NL record this season with 53 saves, allowed the unearned run on two hits in the ninth.

Bill Spiers led off with a double and two outs later, Moises Alou hit an infield single that third baseman Ken Caminiti stopped but threw well wide of first to allow the run to score.

Meat lab sells variety of cheeses, meats from university-owned animals to public

BY TL MEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

You don't have to go to the local grocery store to purchase your T-bone steaks, ground beef, pork sausage or even your Colby cheese. You can get them from K-State's own meat lab.

The meat lab offers a variety of items for sale to the public on Wednesdays from 3 to 6 p.m. and on Fridays from noon to 6 p.m. The sale is in Weber 166.

Originally, the sales were only on Fridays, but lab manager John Wolf said there were requests by students and customers to have the lab open on another day of the week. Wednesdays were added this fall.

All products sold at the lab are from animals owned by K-State, Wolf said. The lab offers cuts of beef, pork and lamb, as well as cheese made in Call Hall.

The kinds of cuts offered vary each week and is determined by what product comes through the lab, said Amy Harris, senior in animal science and lab employee.

The products coming through the lab are based on what animals are used in the animal science classes.

PRICE INFO
Ground beef sells for $1.75 a pound. Pork sausage is on sale for $1.00 a pound. Colby cheese sells for $2.30 a pound. The T-bone sells for $5.69 a pound, and the K. C. Strip sells for $6.59 a pound.

Special cuts and custom orders can be done as well, as long as they are called in ahead of time, Wolf said.

The Graduate Student Association and the K-State Student Union also use meat from the lab to serve at various functions.

All products are sold under the Wildkat brand label.

Other products offered include bratwursts, pepperoni sticks, bologna and summer sausage.

Harris said a lot of K-State staff and elderly couples are regulars at the meat sale.

The preparation and processing involved in getting the meat ready for sale is done by K-State students who work in the lab.

"Most of them want to learn this trade. If they don't, they won't last long. They can't handle it," Wolf said.

One employee, Jennifer Burke, senior in agricultural education, has worked in the meat lab since fall 1996.

"I like buying here, because I know where it's coming from and what has been added," Burke said.

Harris buys there, too.

"I know exactly how it was made, cut, handled and prepared," she said.

Clubs improve student oratory skills

BY JAMI STUMP
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cold feet, sweaty hands and stomach butterflies normally are experienced before giving a speech or presentation, but two colleges at K-State have student organizations to help reduce those uncomfortable feelings.

The College of Engineering and College of Business Administration have formed Toastmaster clubs to help students develop and improve public speaking skills.

Toastmasters is an international organization. Manhattan has four clubs — the two clubs on campus, one in the Manhattan community, and Farm Bureau has a club for its employees.

The College of Veterinary Medicine also is looking into establishing a club.

The Powercat Toastmasters, the engineering club, meets at 4:30 p.m. every Tuesday in Durland 129. Toastmasters in Business meets at 6 p.m. every week for three weeks in Calvin 217. Every fourth week they have a social meeting at a restaurant or bar.

"The most exciting thing about Toastmasters is the relationship you develop with the other people in the club," Brett Krug, senior in architectural engineering and a Toastmaster area governor, said. "Everyone has a common purpose of helping each other out and improving our communication skills."

Lisa Grossenbacher, senior in finance and president of Toastmasters in Business, said Toastmasters is different than other organizations.

"It's different than every other club because you work on your skills," she said. "You become more confident in front of groups, and you really get to know the people in the club."

Brian Hall, fifth-year student in architectural engineering, said meetings follow a general outline. Members participate in several ways at the meetings — they serve as the master of ceremonies or timers, they give speeches and evaluate other speeches.

Hall said he enjoys the table topics portion of the evening. Table topics are when a mediator asks a question or states a phrase, and one member of the club has to answer that question.

"Table topics challenge you in a certain amount of time to come up with something intelligent to say when answering a question," Hall said. "I really enjoy listening to table topics, especially when you have creative people in your group."

Shawn Lorg, fifth-year senior in electrical engineering, said practice makes speakers more comfortable.

"The more often you are in front of people, the better you get," Lorg said. "When you get out of practice, you're not as polished or as comfortable. Everyone must practice their speaking skills, and in Toastmasters you can even compete."

Lorg said there are several levels of competition in Toastmasters. Beginning at the club level, speakers can advance to area, division, district, regional and then finally to international competition.

In the fall, Toastmasters has a humorous speech contest and an evaluation contest, Lorg said.

"In the evaluation contest, a person who is not competing is the test speaker. Everyone evaluates the same speech," Lorg said.

Lorg said the engineering group is looking for new members from the engineering college and from other colleges.

"We encourage those people outside of engineering to join," Lorg said. "It is good to get a different perspective, because we are all engineers."

IF YOU GIVE A ...

Author delights children by finding answers to some more unusual questions

BY MARY RENEE SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If you know what happens if you give a mouse a cookie, a moose a muffin or a pig a pancake, you know Laura Numeroff.

Children filled McCain Auditorium Tuesday morning to meet Numeroff, who has written a number of childrens' books but probably is best known as the author of "If You Give a Mouse a Cookie."

Numeroff and illustrator Nate Evans were in Manhattan to promote and autograph copies of their book "Monster Munchies."

The wiggling youngsters settled down as Numeroff came on stage and read "If You Give a Mouse a Cookie."

The audience of mostly first and second-grade students from area schools laughed as Numeroff read the new book "Monster Munchies." The book counts monsters of various sizes and shapes as they eat various things, "One giant monster wears a dress, eats the couch and makes a mess."

She said the idea for this book came to her in the middle of the night and began as just a bunch of rhyming words, "Twelve tall monsters at the dance, drink some punch and eat their pants."

Evans, illustrator of "Monster Munchies," worked for Hallmark in Kansas City, Mo., before moving into illustrating childrens' books, Numeroff said. During the morning presentation, Evans drew a few sample monsters on a large overhead projector, much to the amusement of the young audience.

Although Numeroff has written a number of childrens' books before "Monster Munchies," this is her first book for The Cat in The Hat Beginner Books series. The series is designed for beginning readers. The series includes books by Dr. Seuss and Stan and Jan Berenstain. Numeroff said she is excited about writing for The Cat in The Hat.

A limited number of autographed copies of the new book are available at The Children's Book Shop in Aggieville.

Woodcut printmaker shares works, encourages others not to give up

BY KELLY LYNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mary Dryburgh, a woodcut printmaker from Sierra Madre, Calif., shared slides of her work and discussed her experiences in printmaking Tuesday at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Dryburgh was the second lecturer in the Visiting Artists Lecture Series at the art museum.

Dryburgh showed some of her more popular prints and a few of her less successful pieces while emphasizing the techniques she used and the sources for her imagery. She also included many slides of photographs showing the actual animals and places that have inspired specific works. Recently, Dryburgh has printed a variety of her woodcuts on maps.

"Printmaking is probably the oldest form of art, other than painting," Teresa Schmidt, assistant professor of art, said.

"A print is a pressing of one inked surface against another, and the most common is woodcut, where you cut out areas that you want to remain white," Schmidt said.

Printmaking is done by engraving or etching artwork onto a block, a piece of wood or metal plate, which then then used to print duplicates of the design. Schmidt said the equipment used for this process is expensive, so many printmakers do not continue their work after graduating from college.

Dryburgh said she discouraged young printmakers from giving up too soon, and she urged them to maintain correspondence and collaborative efforts with other printmakers to cut the costs of printmaking by sharing equipment.

People stop printmaking too soon, but successful works sometimes require a full, mature mind and a lifetime of experience, Dryburgh said.

Dryburgh's prints are primarily black and white, some of which she has added small amounts of color to after printing them. Animals, such as black crows, her horse or her dog are often the subjects of her work.

She said the ideas for her prints come from her life and things happening to her — the same way ideas originate for most artists.

As a citizen of both the United States and Canada, Dryburgh's ideas for many of her prints include birds, fish and other primitive images she discovered while living in Canada, Schmidt said.

"She has dealt with the area of Winnipeg, Canada, which is heavily forested with expressive and symbolic images from nature," Schmidt said.

Dryburgh commonly revisits woodcuts she has made in the past and changes them to create a new print by incorporating new techniques or ideas.

"You're building on a familiar piece of territory making it richer or closer to what you think is right," Dryburgh said. "If it compels you once, it can compel you again."

Dryburgh describes her work as iconographic, or symbolic.

"I don't draw a specific house. I draw the sense of a house, the spirit of a house, the energy of a house, the essence of a house," Dryburgh said.

Tucker, Chan defend top spot at box office

BY MICHAEL FLEEMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — Jackie Chan and Chris Tucker's hectic "Rush Hour" held the box office top spot for a second week, fending off the furious debut of Robert De Niro's action film "Ronin."

The horror film "Urban Legend" also had an impressive premiere, but director John Waters' latest offering, "Pecker," opened to a disappointing $541,646 for 15th place, according to final figures released Monday from Exhibitor Relations Co. Inc.

Overall, the box office was up more than 4 percent from the same weekend a year ago, paced by the unexpected success of "Rush Hour," which collected $21.2 million in its second week to bring its total to $64 million.

"Ronin" debuted in second with $12.7 million, just head of "Urban Legend," with $10.5 million for third. The drama "One True Thing" brought in $4.44 million for fourth, inching out the resilient "There's Something About Mary," which had $4.43 million. After 11 weeks, "Mary" has grossed an impressive $153.3 million.

"Clay Pigeons" had the best performance among films in limited release, grossing $167,364 on 19 screens, for a strong per-location average of $8,809. The controversial "Lolita" had a less-than-expected $6,253 average on 15 screens.

Coastline still faces problems from Georges

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PASCAGOULA, Miss. — The whirlwind that was Georges began to disappear from the weather map Tuesday, but its story still was being written: Rains drenched Alabama and the Florida Panhandle, and evacuees slowly returned to find out what happened to their homes.

Downgraded to just a tropical depression, Georges and its downpours moved northeast, into Georgia and South Carolina. The hurricane wind that ripped through the coast with gusts as high as 174 mph had dropped to 35 mph.

President Clinton declared the entire storm-damaged swath a disaster area and planned to visit as soon as recovery operations allowed. Power remained out to about 400,000 customers from Louisiana to Florida.

Rivers continued to overflow. The Pascagoula River at Merrill rose from 3.4 feet on Monday to 20.8 feet on Tuesday and was expected to swell to more than 26.5 feet later in the day, nearly 5 feet over flood stage.

Along the river, sheriff's boats had to rescue residents trapped by the storm.

Some parts of the Alabama coast had received 2 1/2 feet of rain in addition to damaging wind. At the Dog River south of Mobile, where more than 100 boats capsized or were damaged, crews raked broken wood and other debris from the water.

After killing more than 370 people in the Caribbean, Georges was blamed for four deaths in the United States: an elderly woman who died in the heat while being evacuated from New Orleans; two people who were killed in Louisiana and Florida in fires caused by candles; and one person who died in an accident on a slick highway near Crestview, Fla.

Along the Gulf Coast, it will be awhile before the damage is added up. Some places suffered greatly, but overall, Georges was not a catastrophe.

Still, the effects of the enormous, slow-moving storm were immense.

"We just serve such a mighty God. He's so awesome," said Betty Murray, who owns Pas-Point Glass in Pascagoula, where workers were fixing a 40-by-100-foot patch of roof that had blown a half-mile away. "Can you hear the wind, and not know who sends it? He can start it and he can stop it."

Most interstates reopened, though there was some flooding. Traffic lights were down and military police directed traffic. Utility crews worked to restore power.

Some of those who fled were going back. In Mississippi, the Red Cross' shelter population of more than 15,000 was dropping throughout the day. But some people would find that their homes were far from habitable.

At the beach in Pascagoula, Jackie Burrow said she was amazed that her brick home had only a little water damage. But amid the seaweed in her flower beds and shrubbery, she found debris from other houses: kitchen cabinets, aerosol cans, lifejackets, a birdhouse, even a section of wall with the sockets still attached.

Arafat accepts Israeli plan for West Bank pullback

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat accepted Israel's formula for turning over more land on the West Bank Tuesday and voiced hope that an agreement could be concluded at a White House summit in mid-October. "Peace is a Palestinian need, Israeli need, Arab need, international need," Arafat said.

With momentum toward an accord growing, President Clinton and Arafat were looking ahead to a time when the United States may be able to "engage formally" with the Palestinians, White House spokesman Mike McCurry said after the two leaders had hour long talks.

McCurry said the two leaders "talked at some length about the arrangements that will exist when the United States can engage formally with the Palestinian Authority."

That, he said, might involve establishing a joint committee that "could actually, formally work on, in effect, bilateral relations."

The statement by McCurry suggested the Clinton administration could be preparing for Palestinian statehood, or at least upgrading U.S. dealings with the current Palestinian Authority that Arafat sees as a precursor to a state.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said Arafat assured Clinton he would try to counter terrorism against Israel. "He will exert every possible effort," Erekat said.

Israel's pullback would cover 13 percent of the West Bank, on top of the 27 percent Israel promised earlier to hand over to Arafat's Palestinian Authority.

It was proposed by the Clinton administration last winter to prod Israel to give up more of the West Bank. Arafat, who had claimed virtually all of the territory, agreed to settle for the 13 percent.

Israel, meanwhile, proposed what its diplomats called "refinements." These included setting aside 3 percent of the land for a nature preserve, with Israel having a hand in maintaining security over the undeveloped area.

"We agreed to it to facilitate the negotiations" for an overall West Bank settlement, Arafat told reporters in the White House driveway after his meeting with Clinton.

Asked if an accord would be signed at the summit Clinton plans to have here in mid-October, the Palestinian leader said, "We hope so."

Clinton proposed the summit meeting and negotiating schedule during a three-way session with Arafat and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Monday.

With the territorial issue basically resolved, the focus of U.S. mediation has shifted to whether Arafat can satisfy Netanyahu's demands to disrupt terrorist cells on Palestinian-held land, confiscate weapons from militant groups and have the Palestine Liberation Organization strike all anti-Israeli references from its covenant.

On the contested West Bank, meanwhile, a car rigged with explosives blew up Tuesday in an industrial area, killing an activist in the Hamas organization and wounding two other supporters of the Islamic militant group that claims responsibility for bloody attacks in Israel, Palestinian police said.

Three strong musical personalities join forces for a performance that will surprise and delight. Their concert features a winning mix of Bach, bluegrass, jazz, world music, with a little R&B on the side.

Fleck is an avant-country banjo player, perhaps best known for his work with the Flecktones. Marshall plays a variety of instruments from the mandolin family and has performed with the David Grisman Quintet, Stephane Grappelli and Mark O'Connor. Bassist Meyer is a composer who's at home playing bluegrass and recording country music in Nashville as well as serving as the regular bassist for the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center.

"The three together were, quite possibly the sharpest and at the same time the most relaxed ensemble I've ever seen, distinguished first by pinpoint rhythm, next by endless shades of time and touch, and finally by sheer enjoyment."

Supreme Court justices get jump start on docket

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Supreme Court said Tuesday it will decide whether educators have a legal responsibility to stop students from sexually harassing their classmates, an issue of enormous importance to schools nationwide.

The justices will decide whether a Georgia school district can be sued over teachers' alleged failure to step in after a fifth-grader complained that another student was sexually harassing her.

A federal appeals court said a federal anti-discrimination law does not allow lawsuits involving student-on-student harassment, although children can sue over such misconduct by a teacher.

The case is not about ordinary teasing or schoolyard hazing. The girl says the boy, also a fifth-grader, repeatedly tried to touch her breasts and other body parts, rubbed against her in a suggestive way, and made vulgar comments indicating he wanted to have sex with her.

The American Association of University Women Educational Foundation said in 1993 that 85 percent of girls and 76 percent of boys had experienced sexual harassment in school. But Julie Underwood of the National School Boards Association said Tuesday that since then, many districts have drafted anti-harassment policies and sought to educate students and teachers about the problem.

In June, the Supreme Court made it harder for students to force school districts to pay financial damages over sexual harassment by a teacher. But the ruling said payment can be ordered when someone with authority to do something about the problem "has actual notice of or is deliberately indifferent" to the teacher's misconduct.

In the Georgia case, a federal appeals court ruled that a federal law known as Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 does not apply when students harass each other.

The Clinton administration urged the high court to overturn that ruling.

Government lawyers said the justices' ruling in June "makes clear that when a school district responds with deliberate indifference to known incidents of sexual harassment of a student, it discriminates against that student."

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last year threw out a lawsuit against the Monroe County, Ga., school board and two officials.

Aurelia Davis sued over a five-month "barrage of sexual harassment and abuse" she said her daughter LaShonda endured at Hubbard Elementary School in Forsyth, Ga., in the 1992-93 year.

The lawsuit stated that LaShonda and her mother reported each incident to school officials, but the boy was never disciplined.

He pleaded guilty to sexual battery after Davis complained to the county sheriff.

In granting review to that case and 11 others that arrived during their summer recess, the justices got a head start on the 1998-99 term scheduled to begin Monday. The court also agreed to decide:

—How far police can go in searching the personal belongings of motor vehicle passengers when the officers suspect the driver committed a crime.

—Whether states violate poor people's right to travel when they limit the amount of welfare benefits paid to new residents. California's policy imposing such limits was blocked by lower courts.

—Whether the NCAA can be sued under a federal law banning sexual discrimination by any program or activity receiving federal financial aid.

—To what extent race can be considered in drawing election districts. The justices agreed to take a third look at a much-disputed congressional district in North Carolina.

Bed & breakfasts gaining popularity on Internet

BY ROGER PETTERSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

As bed & breakfasts grow in popularity and spread across the landscape, more of these inns that offer a personal touch are looking for customers on the Internet.

You can laboriously search the World Wide Web to find a B&B in a city or region where you plan to travel.

Or, you can turn to one of the many B&B directories that have sprung up on the Web to make planning your trip a little easier.

America's Gallery of Bed & Breakfast Inns — www.abcsn.com/ — has listings of B&Bs arranged by state, along with photos.

Inns range from the Opal Ranch Inn at Payson, Ariz., a "quiet country retreat" with barnyard animals and access to hiking trails, to the colonial-style Williamsburg Sampler at historic Williamsburg, Va.

The Innkeepers' Register — www.innbook.com/index.html — says it lists more than 300 inns and B&Bs where top innkeepers themselves like to stay in the United States and Canada.

One example is the LaCorsette Maison Inn in Newton, Iowa, described as "elegant, yet comfortable," with gourmet cooking and a place on the National Historic Register.

The Innkeepers' Register offers gift certificates.

The Bed & Breakfast Channel — www.bbchannel.com/index.htm — says it has more than 20,000 listings, and many entries include photos. In Kansas, for example, Channel has entries running the alphabet from Abilene — for the Balfours' House — to Winfield — the Iron Gate Inn and Hiatts.

The American Bed & Breakfast Association — www.abba.com/index.htm — provides a quality rating for the inns it lists. Many of its entries include symbols to show whether an inn allows smoking or pets, or has wheelchair access.

America's Inn & Lodge Directories — www.dallasadmall.com/ — has regional directories for the West, East and Canada, along with a directory of inns for sale.

Bed and Breakfast Inns Online — www.bbonline.com/ — touts listings for more than 1,500 B&Bs and has a monthly contest for free lodging

Private economists, however, said Tuesday's decision to lower the federal-funds rate, which has been at 5.5 percent for 18 months, still represented a remarkable turnaround for Fed policy-makers, who as recently as July were leaning toward raising rates to fight inflation.

Many economists said Tuesday's reduction probably was just the first of a series that would send the funds rate down by a full percentage point over the next year.

"It is better for the Fed to take it step by step so long as they don't take too long between steps," said Allen Sinai, chief global economist at Primark Decision Economics.

Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan first signaled the Fed's change of heart earlier this month when he warned the United States was unlikely to remain an "oasis of prosperity" in the face of a currency crisis that began in Asia, then spread to Russia in August and is now threatening countries in Latin America.

So far, the main affect on the United States has been to send the trade deficit to record levels. American exporters have lost valuable overseas markets, and Asian products, made cheaper by currency devaluations, have flooded into this country.

Russia's botched devaluation of its currency brought the crisis closer to home by disrupting Brazil and a number of Latin American countries, prompting panicked investors to flee those countries' markets.

With Clinton administration officials working behind the scenes to help the International Monetary Fund come up with a multibillion dollar bailout for Brazil, Greenspan indicated last week that the Fed stood ready to do its part to calm turbulent markets.

U.S. companies depend on Latin American countries for many of their sales.

Lower U.S. interest rates help to ease interest-rate pressures in foreign countries and build confidence that the United States will remain a buyer of last resort.

David Jones, chief economist at Aubrey G. Jones & Co. in New York, said Greenspan might have run into opposition for a bolder half-point cut from Fed officials who cite the lowest unemployment rate in nearly three decades and continued strong consumer demand as offsets to the foreign weakness.

"This was a difficult decision for the Fed. It is rather hard to make a convincing case for lower interest rates in the United States at the present time," said former Fed board member Lyle Gramley, economist with the Mortgage Bankers Association.

"The Fed was taking this as a psychological step to settle markets down internationally."

SCUBA

Other reasons to take the class vary, said Allen Shelton, owner of Aggie Dive Shop, who taught the students in Enterprise, Kan. He said some people take the class to learn the skills needed to dive on a vacation. Police officers and emergency medical staff also find it useful in their fields.

Shelton, a former police officer, began scuba diving in 1986.

"That year we had a drowning. A 12-year-old drowned, and we didn't have a dive team," Shelton said.

As a result, Shelton and his fellow officers became interested in diving.

"We went out and through our own time and money got certified as divers," Shelton said.

Four years later, Shelton opened Aggie Dive Shop.

There are several places to learn how to scuba dive in Manhattan, including Aggie Dive Shop, UFM and Creative Travel and Scuba. Costs for the first class vary from $190 to $235, depending on the school. Some schools require participants to buy their own equipment; others do not.

Students who take the class earn college credit by meeting several requirements, Shelton said.

Aggie Dive Shop's class is broken into three different sections, starting with classroom time. During this time, the student receives a manual and a video to watch.

"They come in to class, discuss physics, physiology, stress management and then take a quiz," Shelton said.

The next two class sessions are spent with students in the pool, learning valuable skills such as properly weighing themselves and hovering motionless.

"They basically spend a lot of time with the equipment in the water," Shelton said.

Amy Grasser, senior in education, said she was surprised at how heavy the equipment was.

"First we put the equipment on in the water, but the second time we got into the pool, we put the suit on outside the water standing up," Grasser said. "I didn't realize how heavy the equipment was."

Wiss said her first time underwater was confining.

"It's all a little claustrophobic at first," she said.

Shelton said the students' next test, the final proficiency exercise, takes place in an open-water environment.

"It's a real-life practice where the students demonstrate the same skills learned in the pool," Shelton said.

"It is basically a proficiency exercise."

Once students finish the course, the instructor gives them a form to send to PADI that will be processed and sent to K-State.

The student then receives one hour of college credit.

Certified scuba divers have a variety of options when looking to dive. The Lake of the Ozarks has great scuba-diving waters, said Frank Wasinger, master diver and teacher at Central Travel and Scuba.

"Most of those lakes down in the Ozarks are excellent," Wasinger said.

Grasser said she would encourage others to take scuba-diving lessons.

"Go ahead and do it, because it's something you can enjoy for the rest of your life," Grasser said.

ate program category.

"It's a reflection of the faculty; it's a reflection of the curriculum; it's a reflection of the work ethic students bring with them; and it's a reflection of the administration that we can do things the way they need to be done," Law said.

The award not only benefits the student who receives it, Shapiro said, but it also helps the entire college through recruitment and faculty development.

"It's important because it's good for our reputation," Shapiro said. "It's important because it gives recognition to K-State at a national and international level."

Along with Rhodes, Truman and Goldwater scholarships, Shapiro said the SOM Fellowship pointed to the continued success of K-State students.

"We are operating and competitive with schools of the highest levels," Shapiro said.

Brent Crittenden, also a May 1998 graduate, was the other nominee from K-State.

Course Information Program to be used for 1st time

Survey to get off ground in October in all general education classes

By FRANK FLATON
Kansas State Collegian

A program to give students more information about courses before they enroll will be used for the first time this semester.

For two years, Student and Faculty senates have worked to develop the Course Information Program (CIP) to give students a better understanding of courses and teaching styles.

CIP will survey students about their experiences in courses; the results will be made public before the enrollment process begins to help students set their schedule.

"Course Information Program is a student initiative to provide students and advisers with meaningful information about course dynamics and faculty teaching styles," said Andy Macklin, student body vice president and CIP chair. "Students and advisers can use this information to help students make sound academic decisions about course selection."

The program will begin with a survey of all general education classes at K-State the week of Oct. 19.

This information will be published in pamphlet form and posted online on the SGA homepage by the beginning of the spring semester.

The survey will consist of questions such as "(What were) the aspects of the class that contributed to your learning experience?" and "Are grading policies for assignments and tests fair?"

CIP was first introduced two years ago as an SGA election issue. Since then, proper planning, faculty approval and regents approval were required to put the program in effect. Two CIP-pilot programs were initiated last year.

"Two pilots were done in the fall and spring last year to collect data to modify the survey and use the information to finalize the 'live version,'" said Patricia Marsh, second year graduate student in psychology and CIP graduate assistant.

Overall, CIP will cost $14,400 in student-privilege fees to cover costs including materials and faculty to administer the surveys.

Marsh said she believes CIP will be effective.

"Information from the pilots seemed to indicate students will take it seriously, and the results will be useful and meaningful," she said. "It will give students more information on courses. In that regard, it will be helpful in scheduling classes."

Macklin said CIP has also been used at Syracuse University and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology with relative success.

"Students continued to use the program at those universities, which indicates it was somewhat successful," Macklin said.

Despite its record at other schools, Macklin acknowledged that CIP has its drawbacks.

"It fits some courses better than others, and it may take students and faculty awhile to get used to this kind of survey," Macklin said.

"One problem is it could be misinterpreted as a teacher evaluation, which it is not.

"It is not a shortcut for students or an evaluation of the general education program, but it will help students match learning styles with teaching styles and to better the learning situation," he said.

Marsh said students may misinterpret the results of the information.

"Since both faculty and students will be affected by the survey, it will be a continuing challenge to balance out the needs and wants of both groups," she said.

Currently, the survey will only be given to students in general education classes.

"Since the survey is only for generaled classes, graduate students and other classes won't be affected by this. We may expand it for all courses, but graduate students will be the last to receive it," Macklin said.

Macklin said students should know CIP is student driven, student funded and faculty supported; however, it is not a cure for enrollment problems.

"These results are to be considered one of many ways students can work with advisers to make sound academic decisions. CIP is just one of those components," Marsh said.

Restructuring plan presented to task force

By LEW FERGUSON
The Associated Press

TOPEKA, Kan. — The 25-year effort to restructure higher education governance in Kansas might have achieved a major breakthrough.

Presidents of the state's six universities, Washburn University and 19 community colleges told the governor's task force they believe the time has come for Kansas to create a state coordinating agency for higher education.

Presidents Edward Hammond of Fort Hays State University and Laura Meeks of Fort Scott Community College presented a plan Wednesday to the Governor's Task Force on Higher Education Structure for Excellence in which the presidents of the 26 institutions had reached consensus.

Not only that, but Bill Docking of Arkansas City, chairman of the Board of Regents which supervises the state universities, said the regents could accept about half the presidents' proposals for changing the system.

The proposal is expected to serve as a working draft in developing a task force proposal to deliver to Gov. Bill Graves by late November.

The presidents' group was invited to flesh out its proposal with details and bring them back to the task force when it next meets near the end of this month.

The presidents' plan envisions creation of a state higher education coordinating agency that would not supplant the existing Board of Regents or Board of

Ryun, challenger face off in debate

■ Issues discussed include saving Social Security, helping farmers.

By LEW FERGUSON
The Associated Press

TOPEKA, Kan. — Republican Congressman Jim Ryun and his 2nd District challenger, Democrat Jim Clark, stuck to familiar topics of saving Social Security, helping farmers combat low commodity prices and campaign-finance reform in a TV joint appearance.

Questioned by a panel of journalists Wednesday at the studio of Public Television Station KTWU, Ryun and Clark clashed over their proposed solutions to those problems and others, but their rhetoric did not turn acrimonious.

Clark, 51, a Topeka advertising and marketing professional, said too many members of Congress "put politics ahead of people." He said he only would serve two or three two-year terms if he wins on Nov. 3.

Ryun, also 51, who won the 2nd District seat two years ago and is seeking re-election, said he was proud of the hand he had in balancing the federal budget and reducing taxes during his first term.

The next important task, he said, is protecting Social Security while awaiting the reform recommendations of a national commission.

The two candidates disagreed over whether a GOP proposal to take $200 billion of a projected $1.6 trillion federal surplus over the next 10 years to reduce targeted taxes is robbing Social Security.

Ryun said the Republican plan to put $1.4 trillion of the projected excess in the Social Security Trust Fund will completely protect the nation's retirement program while providing much-needed tax relief for some Americans.

But Clark said the projected surplus "is primarily Social Security money," adding, "Those tax cuts will

The old Manhattan Union Pacific Depot is located near Fort Riley Boulevard and Kansas Highway 177. The city of Manhattan is ready to restore the old depot to its original state.

RESTORING HISTORY

Once-abandoned train depot prepares to receive facelift

By JEFF SUTTON
Kansas State Collegian

Riding in a box car with a 2-by-8 inch plank boarded across the door, a pot-bellied stove in the corner and a few wooden benches, John Roberts left the Manhattan Union Pacific Depot in August 1943 to fight for his country.

Now, 55 years later, Roberts is still fighting. This time he is fighting to restore that same depot, now abandoned.

"It was always a pleasant site to see that depot, because it meant you were home," said Roberts, a Manhattan real-estate agent. "I hope they maintain the depot."

Though Fort Riley Boulevard now lies on the site of the former Union Pacific railroad tracks, many people, including Roberts, want to see the building restored.

"There are a lot of people who are interested in its future, because they have memories of things that happened there," said Karen Davis, director of community development for the city of Manhattan.

The city gained the title to the property in 1991. After winning several grants to fund a rehabilitation project, it is now ready to restore the depot to its former state.

The project received a $60,000 Heritage Trust Fund grant to stabilize the building's masonry and foundation.

"You're not going to notice that much when the work is done, but it's going to do a lot to stabilize the building," Davis said.

Davis said construction for the stabilization will begin before the year's end. The city is also in the process of contracting with the Kansas Department of Transportation for a grant for $270,000.

"Originally, when we went into a couple of these grants, we talked about a community meeting space," Davis said. "We really have to decide if that is the best use for the facility. Since it's a much larger grant, it's time for us to determine what kind of uses we want there."

Riley County Historical Society and Museum

"When you play, play hard; when you work don't play at all," President Theodore Roosevelt said to the students of Kansas State Agricultural College in the May 2, 1903 photograph.

After a 1981 fire, Union Pacific replaced the tile roof with an asphalt shingle roof. Besides returning to a tile roof, the inside of the building needs to be remodeled, she said.

"Right now the building is a shell," Davis said. "It has no bathroom facilities, no heating or air conditioning and broken windows. So it needs quite a bit of work."

The only other renovation work on the 1901 structure was completed in 1938.

"At one time, there was a ticket counter at the front and women went to one side and men went to the other," Davis said. "Then, in the thirties they remodeled it to where there was one waiting room."

Electrical work was done and the original brick entry tower was removed after storm damage sometime before the 1938 renovation.

Now, the pieces are beginning to be put back together.

"I think things are going to start coming together pretty fast here," Davis said. "I think there are some potential uses out there. We just have to figure out what we can do."

Roberts said he hopes the restoration project will help preserve some of the history and memories associated with the depot.

"It was always great to see that depot," he said. "It would be a crime to lose it."

"I THINK THINGS ARE GOING TO START COMING TOGETHER PRETTY FAST HERE."

New store celebrates grand opening today

Eddie Bauer will open its doors to the Manhattan market at 10 a.m. today in Manhattan Town Center.

The store sells men's and women's casual clothing, accessories and outdoor merchandise.

Eddie Bauer will celebrate its grand opening with a fall sale that began companywide yesterday. Cathy Hill, store manager, said that about three-fourths of the store's merchandise will be on sale.

Ann Harts, vice president of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, said the opening is the culmination of efforts from many groups. Much of the credit belongs to existing retailers and retail organizations representing Manhattan's east side, west side, Westloop Shopping Center, downtown and Aggieville, she said.

"It just proves what we know: It's a good place to do business," Harts said.

Monnie Applegate, marketing director for the mall, said the store's opening reflects the mall's strong business over the years.

Currently, mall occupancy is better than in past years, she said.

"Our occupancy is definitely up, and it's a reflection on the fact that the shopping center celebrated its 10-year anniversary last year," Applegate said.

Because many of the original contracts were for 10 years, the mall is using the leasing opportunities to attract new businesses and provide more opportunities to shoppers.

"It reflects the fact that the shopping center is doing very well," said Applegate, who said the new store should do well with K-State students.

Hill said she already had seen a strong showing from K-State with her employees, and she expected an even bigger response from student shoppers in the next few days.

The store has a new design, but the differences were not so large that shoppers familiar with other Eddie Bauer stores would feel out of place, Hill said.

"Once you walk in, you won't notice the difference," Hill said.

Jazz artist, lecturer to perform at K-State

A visiting lecturer and jazz flautist will be part of Sunday's kickoff for the 1998 Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

Galen Abdur-Razzaq, from Montclair, N.J., will give a lecture and performance at 7:30 p.m. in All Faith's Chapel. Admission is free.

Dawnielle Robinson, coordinator for the Office of Diversity and Dual Career Development, said he sent his compact disc to her office, and she decided he would be a great performer for the annual week-long event.

"His CD is wonderful," she said. "His music is a blend of cultures."

In addition to performing, Robinson said Abdur-Razzaq would speak, though she wasn't sure yet of his topic.

"He usually lectures on African-American jazz and the presence of all the different cultures in jazz," she said. "I think he's waiting to get a feel for the campus."

Hondas, Toyotas top car thieves' wish lists

DETROIT — Honda and Toyota were the most popular makes among thieves nationwide last year, but some domestic light trucks made gains on the latest list of most-stolen vehicles.

According to the National Insurance Crime Bureau, in a list to be released today, the Honda Accord, Toyota Camry, Oldsmobile Cutlass, Honda Civic and Ford Mustang were the most stolen vehicles in 1997.

They were followed by the Toyota Corolla, Chevrolet C/K pickup, Nissan Maxima, Jeep Grand Cherokee and Ford F-series pickup.

The list is based on 447,007 stolen vehicle reports submitted to the nonprofit bureau by its member insurance companies nationwide. The figure represents 32 percent of all vehicles reported stolen last year.

The bureau combines theft reports for all model years of a particular make and model, unlike a similar annual list issued by CCC Information Services Inc. That company, which also tracks vehicle thefts for the insurance industry, lists the most-stolen vehicles by model year.

The two lists feature some of the same cars. CCC reported in March that nine of the top 10 stolen cars in 1997 were Toyota Camrys or Honda Accords. The 10th was the 1995 Ford Mustang.

More popular light trucks appeared on the bureau's top 25 list: the Chevy and Ford pickups, Jeep Grand Cherokee and Cherokee sport utility vehicles, and the Plymouth Voyager and Dodge Caravan minivans.

The lists of most-stolen vehicles usually lag sales trends by several years. As a popular model ages and demand for parts rises, it moves up on the theft lists.

"Vehicle thieves are not trendsetters," said Ed Sparkman, senior vehicle theft manager for the bureau. "They usually go for the most popular vehicles because they provide the best market for stolen auto parts."

Buying habits across the country also are reflected in theft trends. American vehicles are the top targets in Detroit and Chicago, pickups are the most popular in Houston, and Japanese cars lead the list in Los Angeles.

Man given jail time for airplane incident

GREENSBORO, N.C. — A man got 19 months in prison for picking fights during an airline flight and urinating in the aisle.

Walter Andrew Everhart, 36, told a federal judge Monday that he remembered none of the episode, saying painkillers and alcohol caused him to black out during the US Airways flight from Germany to Philadelphia last November.

He also did not recall kicking the seat of a pregnant woman so hard that she fell out and feared she would have a miscarriage.

Witnesses said it took six Polish police officers to subdue Everhart after he urinated into a condom and became unruly.

"I cannot imagine a more volatile situation than what occurred on that flight," U.S. District Judge Frank Bullock Jr. said.

Everhart pleaded guilty to interfering with a flight attendant. The case was transferred to North Carolina because he was living here.

Clinton investigations top $40-million mark

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The cost of the independent counsel's investigations of President Clinton's Whitewater dealings, his affair with Monica Lewinsky and other controversies has topped $40 million.

A government audit report released Wednesday showed Kenneth Starr spent $3.9 million during the six-month period ending March 31, the latest figures available. That brings Starr's expenses to nearly $33.5 million since he took over the investigation in 1994, according to General Accounting Office audits.

Starr's predecessor on Whitewater, Robert Fiske, spent $6 million, making the cost of investigating the Clinton administration almost $40 million — a number that will climb significantly when updated with the past six months' activities.

Starr has estimated he spent at least $4.4 million on the Lewinsky investigation alone over the last eight months. An exact figure won't be available until next spring.

The most expensive independent counsel probe to date was Lawrence Walsh's $48.5 million, six-year investigation of the Reagan administration's Iran-Contra dealings.

Starr was originally hired to investigate Clinton's Whitewater land deals. In 1996, his inquiry was expanded to include the White House travel office firings and the controversy over the White House's gathering of some Republicans' FBI files.

In January, Starr's investigation was expanded again to include the president's affair with Lewinsky and an alleged cover-up. Starr turned over a report to Congress on that aspect of his investigation on Sept. 11, alleging perjury and obstruction of justice.

Starr has said he is nearing completion of the Whitewater probe.

HIV/AIDS RESOURCES

Manhattan agencies offer AIDS testing, treatment

By M.A. Loroff
Kansas State Collegian

There is no exact number of people who have HIV/AIDS in Kansas, according to the Regional AIDS Project. The last recorded state estimate of AIDS cases in Kansas was 1,997.

That number does not include people who have HIV, people who do not know they have the disease and people who have had AIDS tests in another state.

There are eight AIDS clinics in the state of Kansas. One is located in Manhattan.

The Riley County Health Department provides a once-a-month clinic for people who have HIV.

"A specialist in infectious diseases comes from Topeka to work with the clients. At that time, the specialist works with local physicians, reviews medicines and where the client is in the disease," said Joan Smith, health educator of risk reduction for AIDS at the health department.

The health department, the project and Lafene Heath Center provide counseling for people diagnosed with HIV/AIDS.

"I think it's a student problem by looking at the increase in STDs. It is the same type of behavior to put people at risk for AIDS," Smith said.

Cindy Burke, director of health education and promotion at Lafene, agreed with Smith.

"It is a problem. Students continually come in about their risky sexual behavior. One in seven students will contract an STD at college," Burke said.

Both Lafene and the health department offer AIDS tests for around $20.

MORE INFO? For more information contact the Riley County Health Department, 776-4779; Lafene Health Center, 532-6595 or the Regional Aids Project, 587-1999.

"It takes two weeks for the tests to come back after we draw blood," Smith said. "If the first test comes back positive, the lab will test it again a different way. If it comes back positive again, the lab will test it one more time. After at least three tests, we will have the person come in and redraw their blood."

The clinic also takes special precautions when telling a person they tested positive.

"We attend a three-day training to learn the right way to tell a person. After the person is told, we won't let them leave until we know they are stable," Smith said.

Eunice Dorst, executive director of the project said she doesn't recommend at-home AIDS tests.

LIVING WITH HIV/AIDS

Project helps AIDS patients deal with disease; educates others

By M.A. Loroff
Kansas State Collegian

Editor's note: For privacy, some names have been changed.

When people discover they are infected with HIV or AIDS, they often feel they have nowhere to turn. The Regional AIDS Project is designed to help people in that situation when they don't know what to do.

The project has two main goals: to help those who have been infected and to educate others to prevent the spread of HIV and AIDS.

Eunice Dorst, executive director of the project, said the project is not only for those who have HIV or AIDS but for those who are affected by it.

"We help those who are infected and affected." Dorst said. "It can be just as difficult for the family member of a person who is infected."

Dorst said education is the key to stopping the spread of the disease.

"We have a new program to teach parents how to inform and prevent kids of risky behaviors. It is risky behavior that spreads the disease," she said.

The project also travels to various places to give information about safety precautions and hand out free condoms.

The project distributes bags of condoms to bars in Manhattan and Junction City. There are three condoms to a bag, a slip of paper explaining how to put a condom on and the address of the project.

"We put the instructions in there because younger people may not know how to put the condom on," Dorst said.

The project is funded by grants through the Topeka foundation, equities, the Kansas Department of Health and Environment and membership fees.

The money the project receives pays for education, counseling and helps with emergency funding for those who are infected and can't afford health costs associated with the disease.

Earl is one of the people that the project helps. He was diagnosed with HIV in 1990.

"You hear about it in newspapers, but people say 'it can't happen to me.' Bullshit. It's life. The only way to protect yourself is to be educated," he said.

Earl said conceptions that HIV and AIDS is a homosexual disease are wrong.

"I contracted this from a female. It is a heterosexual disease," he said.

During the past two years, Earl said he has lost 18 people he cares about to HIV/AIDS.

"I totally went off all medication after a friend died last Christmas. It gets old, living off pills that make you feel worse than the disease does," he said.

Earl is now back on medication and spends about $3,200 a month on medicine. The Ryan White Foundation helps him pay for medicine, as well as benefits from social security and disability.

Although the state provides money, Earl said it is not enough.

The state provides money based on the amount of people who have reported they have HIV/AIDS in Kansas. Earl said the numbers are inaccurate. Many people live where they choose until they are near death. Then they go home to die.

People also go to other states to have tests performed, he said. In either case, the money will not follow the person back to Kansas.

"It's hard to pay bills, but I do the best I can. I was fired from a job, because I told my employer that I had the disease.

"I still believe in honesty. I was raised to be honest, and I will not change my life for this disease," he said.

Earl said he does a lot of volunteer work through the project to keep his mind off of the disease. One of his projects is to talk to young people about HIV and AIDS.

"If the parents can't talk to their kids about sex, they need to find someone else that will. I harp about it to my kids.

"I don't want to see my kids die before me. It's what my mom and dad are going through," he said.

Earl said using common sense is now to play it safe.

"Always know your partner and wear a latex condom," he said. "If you still feel unsafe, wear two or three. Make sure the expiration date on the condom is still good."

The disease is here, Earl said, but he isn't sure if the message is getting through.

"I don't know that anyone is listening. All I can do is hope."

OUR VIEW

Neglected train depot can make city better

Too many on campus it is a source of mystery, a decrepit old building, shrouded in history and left, empty and forgotten, on a highway entrance ramp.

The building that once served as the Manhattan Union Pacific Depot has been neglected for years. The tracks that once carried presidential candidates, tycoons, soldiers, wives, husbands and children across the country have been stripped and replaced with Fort Riley Boulevard. Windows are broken out, the interior is gutted and its once majestic tile roof has been replaced with tiles made out of the same asphalt that surrounds it.

The depot is situated on one of the most prominent bits of real estate in Manhattan, where Kansas Highway 177 crosses the Kansas River — the entrance from the most populous parts of Kansas, the string of pearls along Interstate 70. It is now as much a gateway as it had been in all its former grandeur. The difference is now it is vacant, deteriorated and overshadowed by the commercial Goliaths that populate Tuttle Creek Boulevard.

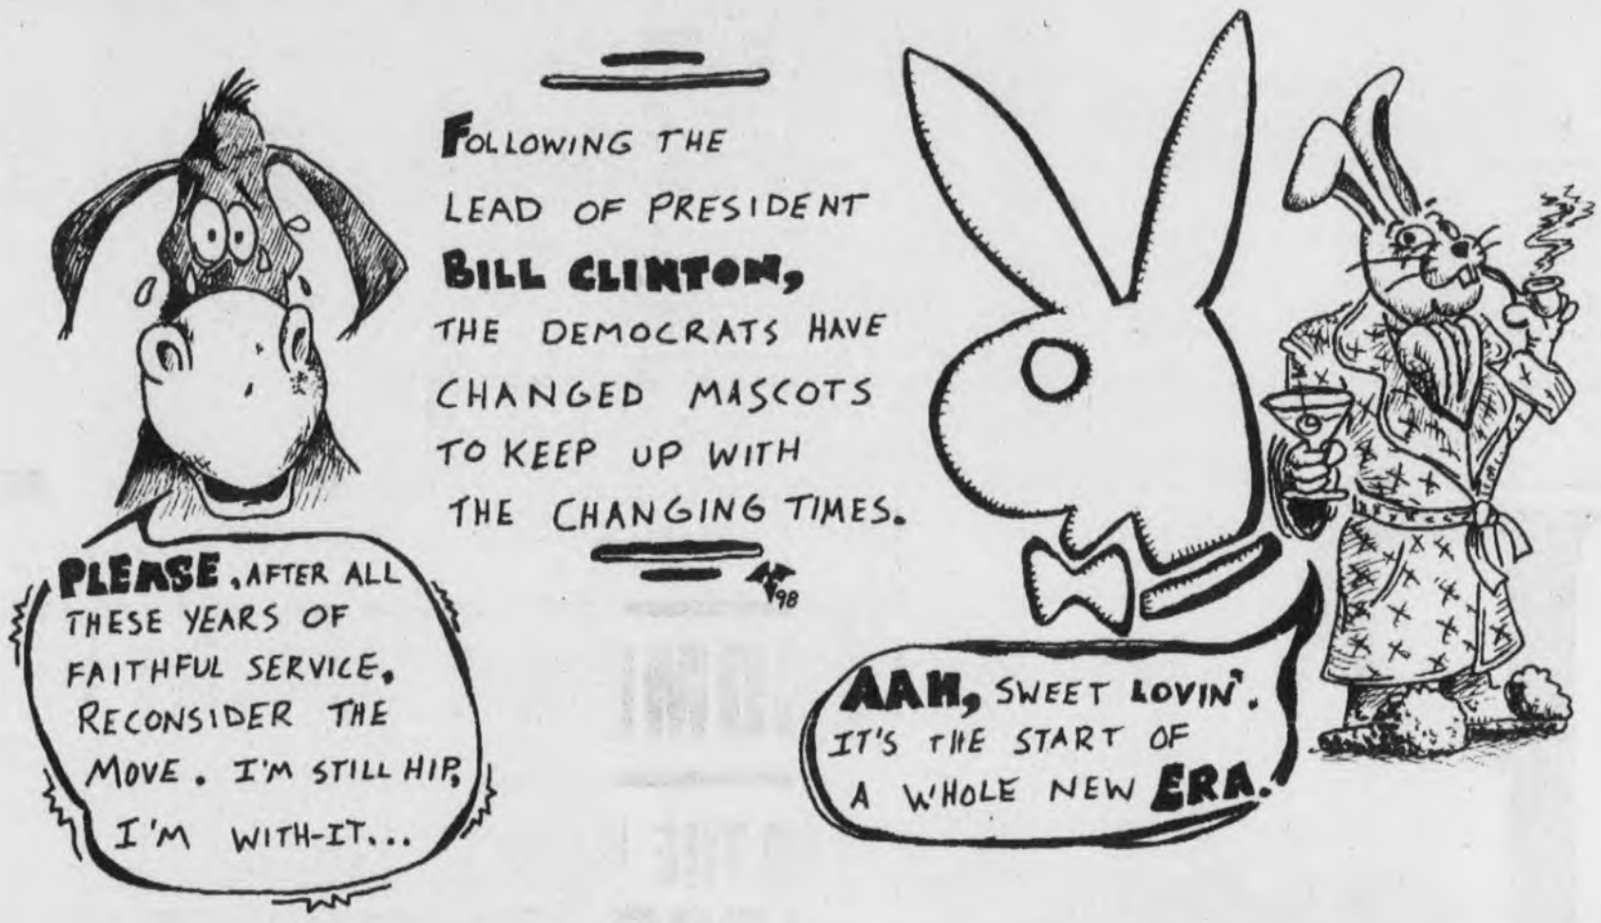
Now, however, things are looking up for the depot. The city of Manhattan acquired the building in 1991, 90 years after it was built as a port on the meandering transcontinental railroad. The city has been biding its time, trying to accumulate grants for the structure and trying to decide what purpose the finished product will serve. Having raised enough money to begin work, the city plans to strengthen the depot's foundation first, then move on to other projects inside.

The people behind the restoration project deserve our gratitude for welcoming this building into our community once again. It has screamed to be used for a long, long time. We hope they keep up with this project, remain careful to stay close to its original design and restore the depot with consideration toward its extensive possibilities.

There are a few drawbacks, though.

The depot is in isolation, separated from downtown and Manhattan Town Center by the exit ramps of Highway 177. The fact that the depot is encircled by concrete also makes parking difficult, which limits the size and scope of purposes for the building.

The bright side, however, is the depot could be used to draw more attention to the industrial side of town, possibly attracting new businesses to the area or helping to support those with projects pending in its vicinity. It also could be used to promote Manhattan as a regional center, as a powerhouse for central Kansas, as the only thing that's really important between Topeka and Denver — bigger than Salina, Kan., bigger than Hays, Kan., bigger than the barbed-wire museum and bigger than the world's largest ball of twine.



One of the editorial board's fears is that the depot will become a tourist trap. We want it to promote the city and its history but not at the expense of its dignity.

Nevertheless, the Riley County Historical Society could find it to be a good home, or it could be the community meeting place that some have already touted it to be.

We think it would make a good visitor's center, a place for football travelers to learn about what they can do with their day when the game is over. It could sell Manhattan as a community, instead of as a commercial enterprise.

MODERN MEDICATION vs. COGNITIVE ABILITY

I don't know if it's the bug du jour or not. All I know is as I sat down for my 2-1/2 hour long class, my nose began to trickle, then drain, then stream. People in the back row were scrambling to stand on the seats of their desk. Notebooks, backpacks, unwary students were washed away in this nasal flood. My kingdom for a tissue.

For the rest of the day, my existence was defined by this sluglike trail I left across campus. When I was lucky, I was merely drowning in my own secretions. At worst, I was spouting mucus with explosive sneezes and trapping squirrels in gelatinous globs like flies in amber. Something had to be done.

I don't like medicine of any nature. I find it's hard enough to keep my body running without adding more chemicals into the mix. But while snsniffing and snorting like a troll, I just wanted to breathe. So I took two ordinary, over-the-counter decongestant medications, that's all, nothing else.

I could breathe, but my mind was now encased in fuzz. Everything I heard and saw I did as if from at the end of a mile-long tunnel. I could breathe, but I couldn't walk in a straight line. Feeding myself became impossible. When you're that detached from reality, you'll be surprised all the places you can find to put a bite of broccoli.

Walking to class (as was possible by focusing all my concentration into the act of "left foot, right foot") might have been a mistake. Maybe there was an inherent irony in nodding off in a class while discussing Sigmund Freud, but it was still shameful. Falling asleep in class is offensive to instructors; it's a painful sign of boredom, even when the truth is your neurons are apparently coated in the same goo that was going Niagara from your nostrils a few hours earlier.

Decision time. When my nose starts paving Manhattan with organic slop, I make snorting sounds, struggle to breathe and honk every few minutes into pieces of refined cardboard called "tissues." If I take medication, it takes me five minutes to pick up a book, if I don't fall over in the process. If I'm angry enough to take "non-drowsy" (read: "hyperactivity") formula, I become a mad, cackling, raw-beef-eating bestial monstrosity perching gargoyle-like on rooftops and leaping at bystanders apropos of nothing, so that can't be the answer.

The disease is intolerable. The cure is even worse. My high school chemistry instructor took an aspirin a day; should I permeate my system with chemicals, build up my tolerance for the ill effects of medical assistance and in the process create an environment inside myself where nothing (probably including myself) can survive? Seems like an answer, doesn't it? Or at least an afternoon of fun trying.

As I ambled up to the Collegian newsroom, an editor was sitting on the steps, fighting off his version of the bug. His tactic, as he explained to me, was vitamins: B, C and D, to be exact (in my medicinal haze, I was wondering who gave him my last grade card). Chemicals, perhaps in the technical sense of the word, but nature's chemicals, instead of something born of a centrifuge or a nuclear reaction. Sometimes simple is the answer.

So that's my plan. No more chemical assistance for me. No more acting like I have a hangover and insulting my instructors in the process. Back to my organic roots. Wholesome, unsynthesized cures for all of life's ills await me. With a positive attitude and no contamination from these chemicals, life will be just fine.

But I haven't eaten all day, so I'll swing by the drive-through.

Traveling evangelists treated poorly by K-State student body

Editor,

I'm writing to comment on the predominately poor way the recent visit by two traveling evangelists to our campus was received by the students who attended their presentation. The two Christian evangelists, Jed Smock and Curtis Schell, could be found preaching in the free-speech zone on the north side of the K-State Student Union most of Monday, and they plan to return to our campus Friday. There was anywhere between 25 and 200 people, mostly students, listening to the evangelists throughout the day.

The way in which most students participated in the question-and-answer format of the presentation was disgraceful. Instead of politely asking well-thought-out questions, they shouted out the first thing they could think of to try to disagree with the evangelists, whether it be relevant to what the evangelists were saying or not.

I attended the presentation for about an hour. During that time, I witnessed students cussing and getting in the evangelists' faces to shout at them. When a question was asked of an evangelist, the evangelist would be hard-pressed to get two words out of his mouth before he was being insulted and ridiculed by the audience. The evangelists, for the most part, reacted calmly. I honestly don't know if this reaction was out of respect — or fear. This kind of behavior gives our great campus a bad name. If a reader disagrees with this, I ask them to imagine what the effect on public opinion of K-State would have been if this presentation had been televised (with all of the cussing bleeped out, of course).

There were a small number of students who were sincere in their comments. They respectfully asked relevant questions and made relevant comments. My hat is off to these students. Most of these students disagreed with what the evangelists were saying, but at least they had the decency to act with dignity.

I fall into this latter category. I disagreed with a large portion of what the evangelists were saying, but I passed on making a fool out of myself by cussing and screaming unintelligible comments.

I believe the student body would benefit considerably by at least acting courteously, even if it is dissenting, to those on campus who are expressing a view that is not popular. I do not see how an institution of higher learning can be successful in its educational mission without open-minded students and faculty.

While many of us might disagree with the ideas presented in an on-campus presentation, we just actually might learn a little from opening our minds to consider these same ideas. If the only thing we get out of this experience is a further justification of our own beliefs, then I still think that is time well spent.

I think it also might serve us well to remember that the Constitution of the United States and its amendments exist not only to serve as a legal guide for the populace but also to protect the rights of citizens who have less popular views. To quote Voltaire, as I notice it is becoming fashionable to quote philosophers on the editorial page: "I may disagree with what a man says, but I would defend to the death his right to say it." I think this sort of attitude of acceptance would bring us nothing but better relations between students and increased understanding of minority opinion.

'Real man' comment offends reader; Clinton should resign

Editor,

I sincerely hope David Levin was not serious when he called President Clinton a "real man." If he was, I feel extremely sorry for any women in his life.

Real men do not cheat on their wives. Real men accept responsibility for their actions. Real men do not lie to everyone in sight — including their family, their colleagues, the American public and the legal system under oath. Real men practice self-control, honesty and loyalty.

On the topic of whether Clinton should resign, I agree with the Collegian board that he should. He has thrown out any hope of being an effective leader by lying under oath and in every other forum. Who in our government or any other nation's government is going to believe what he says now? He has forfeited 100 percent of his credibility.

Thank you for the opportunity to voice my opinion.

Time well spent with others can lead to self-reflection

Waking up to the smell of Grandma's cooking on a Saturday morning was always kindling. Before I ever spent the night with a friend, I can remember sleeping at my grandparents' farm and waking up to eat breakfast Grandma's way.

It wasn't so much that the food was different from my mom's. But it was more the farm atmosphere, the unmistakable smell of fried bacon and buttered toast topped with Welch's grape jelly, and the conversations I had with these two grown-ups that made the moments. I didn't understand the importance of spending time with my grandparents, but I knew I felt content just being with them.

Some things are learned by thinking, discussing, and studying. Other things are learned by experiencing and trying. Then there are those things in life that are gleaned — particularly from people older and wiser than we are. My grandparents offered this.

I don't remember Grandma ever telling me it was important to speak positively about other people, but I do remember her speaking well of others. Grandpa never told me it was important to put other people's needs before my own, but he cared enough to have invested himself in me.

Once, I kicked his tractor out of gear while playing on it. That night, it rolled down a slope and crashed into a pile of wood Grandpa had spent the previous day stacking. It also did a fine job on the fence. My grandpa didn't deal harshly with me, as he could have, but instead he demonstrated kindness. (He did halt my afternoon adventures on the tractor, however.)

The values my grandparents consistently modeled showed me what was important to them. This led to my adopting some of their values as my own.

Another person who has recently influenced my life is Don, a man I met this summer. Don is 60 years older than me and has more youthful sparkle in his eyes than I'll probably ever have. He enjoys talking and can't keep from smiling most of the time. Hesitation was deleted from Don's dictionary long ago. His social and community activities outdo many college students' involvements.

After several visits with Don, I saw his prominent values.

He modeled for me what life can be like after retiring and losing a spouse.

Don also showed me how to make the best of a situation by being optimistic and assertive. After having several of his right-hand fingers shot off, he decided to make his physical problem an advantage. He shakes hands better than most people with five fingers, and chances are high you would never know his hand was different than yours.

The times I have spent talking with Don have encouraged me to check my values, because if values still matter, I had best make certain I have the ones that will make a positive difference in my life.

Today's actions will be tomorrow's stories, and in 60 years I don't want those stories to consist of self-pleasure and pretend relationships. Older generations offer us not only fascinating stories but also practical examples of wisdom. We begin to see values as real elements of which we consist, rather than idealistic words. And we begin to understand how these values govern who we are and who we will become.

Great value exists in finding an older person who can model essential elements for happy living. This is critical for a generation that often forgets to look at the overall picture.

Talking among our peers can lead us to discover important truths, but sometimes we need to spend time with people who have already lived what we are searching for.

Doll helps students with surgery skills

■ Veterinary students use DAISE to practice suturing.

By JENNIFER WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

Third-year students in veterinary medicine have the opportunity to learn the skills they need to be surgeons without working on a live animal.

Dr. Ron McLaughlin, associate professor of clinical sciences, said the Dog Abdominal Surrogate for Instructional Exercises, or DAISE, serves as a "dry run" for the abdominal exploratory and spay/neuter labs that all third-year students must take.

"The body wall of the DAISE is different layers," said Dr. Jim Roush, associate professor of clinical sciences. "And, when you suture a normal animal, you suture those layers of skin as you are coming out."

Students use DAISE, muslin stretched inside embroidery hoops, or sometimes even pig's feet, to practice suturing.

"Nothing compares to the real thing, but you're 10 steps ahead with the DAISE doll," said Tiffany Magid, fourth-year student in veterinary medicine.

Roush said with DAISE, the students aren't under the pressure of working on a living animal.

DAISE helps prepare students for the real thing, Magid said.

"We cover every possible level before we actually do a real surgery," Magid said.

Students learn the basic skills, including hand motions and holding instruments correctly, then apply them to the required surgical procedure.

"Instead of doing a lot of different procedures, it is probably better training if we concentrate on basic surgical skills," Roush said.

"If those are done repetitively and they get those right, they can take those skills and transpose them to any surgery they want to do," Roush said.

Magid said a lot of the art of surgery comes from hand dexterity..

"I learned how to hold instruments and needle holders," Magid said. "I would walk around my house practicing."

Roush said dogs had been purchased by the lab for their previous method of surgery training.

"We used to do three procedures on a dog, and then it was euthanized," Roush said. "Some schools now are still in the mode where every week they do a different dog, and then euthanize them right there. The dog never wakes up, never feels the pain or anything."

Practicing their skills helps veterinary medicine students leave positive impressions on their future clients.

"The way pet owners judge the job you did is by how their pet looks after they get home," said Megan Ehlers, fourth-year student in veterinary medicine.

Dan Quisenberry loses battle with brain cancer

BY DOUG TUCKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Dan Quisenberry, a star reliever for the Royals whose droll wit and funky delivery charmed fans and baffled batters, died Wednesday of brain cancer. He was 45.

Quisenberry died around dawn in his home in Leawood, Kan., after a nine-month battle with the illness. He had undergone surgery twice since December when sudden, persistent headaches were diagnosed as the most lethal type of tumor.

"Dan was one of the finest people I've ever known," said Atlanta Braves general manager John Schuerholz, who headed the Royals' scouting department 20 years ago when an undrafted Quisenberry had to plead for a tryout.

Quisenberry, a three-time All-Star, was the major league career saves leader from 1979-85 and helped the Royals win two American League pennants and a World Series.

News of his illness last winter jolted Kansas City, where the affable, quick-witted Quisenberry had remained a popular and active member of the community. During his playing days, he devoted a great deal of time and energy to gathering food for the homeless and needy. While continuing that work since retiring in 1990, he had also begun giving poetry readings in public libraries.

"I don't remember him as the guy who got all the ground balls and double plays," said Jamie Quirk, a Royals coach and longtime teammate. "He was more important than that. He was much more."

Quisenberry came up late in 1979 when injuries devastated the Royals' pitching staff. Pale and skinny, he had an awkward-looking, submarine delivery and a sinkerball that big-league hitters figured to murder.

Instead, they usually pounded balls into the ground, where a talented infield headed by nine-time All-Star second baseman Frank White scooped them up.

"You'd go, 'God, why can't I hit this guy?'" Quirk said.

In a 12-year career, he compiled 244 saves — 13th all time. He was the AL saves leader five times while helping the Royals win pennants in 1980 and '85.

His 45 saves in 1983 was then the major league record. Between 1979 and 1985, when Kansas City beat St. Louis for its only World Series title, Quisenberry's 217 saves were tops in the majors.

"I lull them into a false sense of security by letting them watch me pitch," he once deadpanned.

"If overconfidence can cause the Roman Empire to fall, I ought to be able to get a ground ball."

The inveterate jokester's humor was usually directed at himself.

"I found a delivery in my flaw," he once explained after coming out of a slump.

During his 10 years in Kansas City, Quisenberry was a pivotal figure in many of the team's greatest moments. He got the save in the famous "Pine Tar Game" against the New York Yankees after Billy Martin protested George Brett's bat. And he got the victory in a 2-1 win over St. Louis in the sixth game of the '85 World Series.

"He was not only a very big part of the great success we enjoyed in Kansas City, but he was as fine a man as I've ever met," said Schuerholz, the Royals' GM during their championship seasons.

"The transformation from modestly successful college pitcher to dominant major league closer took place because of Dan's determination, intelligence and competitive spirit. When we lose someone like Dan Quisenberry, we have lost too much."

In 1986, Quisenberry's sinkerball seemed to desert him. Once-harmless grounders began turning into line drives. He was released in 1988, spent a year with St. Louis and then retired after a brief stay with the San Francisco Giants.

Bret Saberhagen, his teammate in Kansas City from 1984-1988, called him "a really great human being."

"He would always be able to make light of (situations) whether he did well or did bad," Saberhagen said. "He was a great teammate, a great friend."

In May, just before his second surgery, a frail Quisenberry was inducted into the team's hall of fame during emotional ceremonies in Kauffman Stadium.

"I'm so blessed," he said the crowd. "I loved playing in front of you folks, great fans. Great city. Great team."

White, now a Royals coach, stood near first base and sobbed.

"God bless you all," Quisenberry said. "Thanks for the prayers. Thank you very much."

Quisenberry is survived by his wife, Janie, and teenage children Alysia and David. Funeral arrangements were pending.

Junior leads men's golf team to 7th place finish in tourney

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's golf team placed seventh in the D.A. Weibring Intercollegiate golf tournament in Normal, Ill., on the Illinois State University Golf Course, Sept. 27 and 28.

Mark Sears, junior, led the way for the men shooting a career low 71-75-73-219 en route to an individual 17th-place finish. His previous career-best finish was last spring when he finished 56th in the Big 12 Conference Tournament. Chris Brungardt, sophomore, posted 72-76-75-223 for a 31st-place tie. Brian Racette, junior, shot 74-74-79-227 and Josh Cook, junior, put up 76-78-75-229. Scott McNeely, freshman, rounded out the team scores with 76-77-77-230. Bryan Milberger competed individually and shot 75-75-74-224 for a 40th-place tie.

"Sears may be the most-improved golfer in the NCAA Division I level this year," golf coach Tim Norris said. "He's done a great job for us. He dedicated himself this summer. I've always thought he had the game. He is just more focused, and he knows what he wants to do. He hasn't lived or died on one or two shots."

Norris said he was pleased with the team's finish, but it has a long way to go.

He said he feels that the team is well on its way to a solid squad.

"We have a ways to go as a team," Norris said. "Some guys are really stepping up right now. Chris Brungardt did a great job in his first Division I tournament. He looks like factor on the team. McNeely didn't play as well as he did in the Kansas University tournament, but I think he will be a good player down the stretch. Cook played fairly well. We'll be pretty solid."

The next men's action will be Oct. 9-11 in Manhattan at the Country Club. It will be the first collegiate tournament in Manhattan.

"We're excited to play here," Norris said. "Once Colbert Hills opens I would like to have a tournament in the fall and one in the spring. We want to do as much as possible to do well on our own course. We expect to do well. It's tough to play at home. I think some of the parents are coming up for the event. I think they need that pressure, though. That's good at this point in time. All 10 team members will play in the home tournament."

Woman proves more knowledgeable; columnist seeks to prove manhood

VIEWPOINT

SAM FELSENFELD

I got beat by a woman.

In certain circumstances, that can be a good thing. In this situation, though, it's not.

I'm going head-to-head with a guest each week in my column, and we're picking football games against the spread. I had gone 3-0 against my guests, three respectable males, and then the first week I chose to go up against a woman, I lost.

I got beat by a woman.

I've been shaking my head since Saturday.

What am I going to tell my mom?

My mom is the one with the shirt that says, "The best man for the job is a woman." If I ever get divorced, she'll probably root against me because that way, the woman would get everything (I'm getting married next May 23, and I'm not going to be getting divorced — this is just hypothetically speaking).

What is she going to say when this column arrives in her e-mail and she finds out I lost to a woman? She'll call me up to laugh at me. At least it won't be on my phone bill.

I'm still shaking my head. In defeat. To a woman.

A woman e-mailed me last week and said she wanted to go head-to-head with me. Of course, she also explained to me that she wasn't exactly sure about how the spreads work. I might have to pick her up as a guest picker — sort of the way Florida picked up The Citadel in its season-opener — to get a win. But what would I do if she ... No. No way.

Anyway, last week, in this space, where I got beat by a woman, I said I would select Air Force as the top team in the country if I had a vote. Well, Air Force is no longer undefeated, and its strength of schedule probably won't get it into the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl.

So I'm changing my vote to Arkansas. Florida State, a great team, lost to North Carolina State, which lost to Baylor, which lost to Oregon State, which lost to Arizona State, which lost to Brigham Young, which lost to Alabama, which was BOMBED by the team receiving my No. 1 vote, Arkansas.

If I thought Air Force would be a shoo-in to visit the White House after a national championship, Arkansas would be a super shoo-in. The Razorbacks will remain my top team until they're beaten — or until I can prove K-State deserves a No. 1 vote.

I'd like to mention, though, just because my guest picker is enjoying her victory; I set the over/under for David Allen's longest punt return at 48 yards, and we both thought it would go over. I changed it to 55, though, because she thought he would run one back from 54. If I wouldn't have changed it, she would have stayed with the over, and WE WOULD HAVE TIED.

But I got beat by a woman.

Well, here we go. Time for some pickin'. Football: It's not just for women any more.

My guest this week, Jacob Jansonius, e-mailed me last week and wanted me to take on some real competition. He's in my club — you know, the "Bet You $10 You Can't Spell and Pronounce my Last Name Correctly" club.

He also informed me that no K-State fan has appeared on ABC more often than he has.

So far this season, I'm 28-14 picking games. My guest pickers have combined to go 23-19. Overall, I'm 3-1.

1. Syracuse -12 at North Carolina State. Not only do the Orangemen have revenge on their minds from last year's embarrassing overtime loss to the Wolfpack, but they're 25 points better, too. My pick: Syracuse to cover. Guest pick: Syracuse to cover.

2. Penn State +14 at Ohio State. It would be great for the Cats if Penn State won. Of course, if that happened, the Buckeyes and Nittany Lions would both wind up ahead of K-State in the polls somehow. My pick: Ohio State to cover. Guest pick: Ohio State to cover.

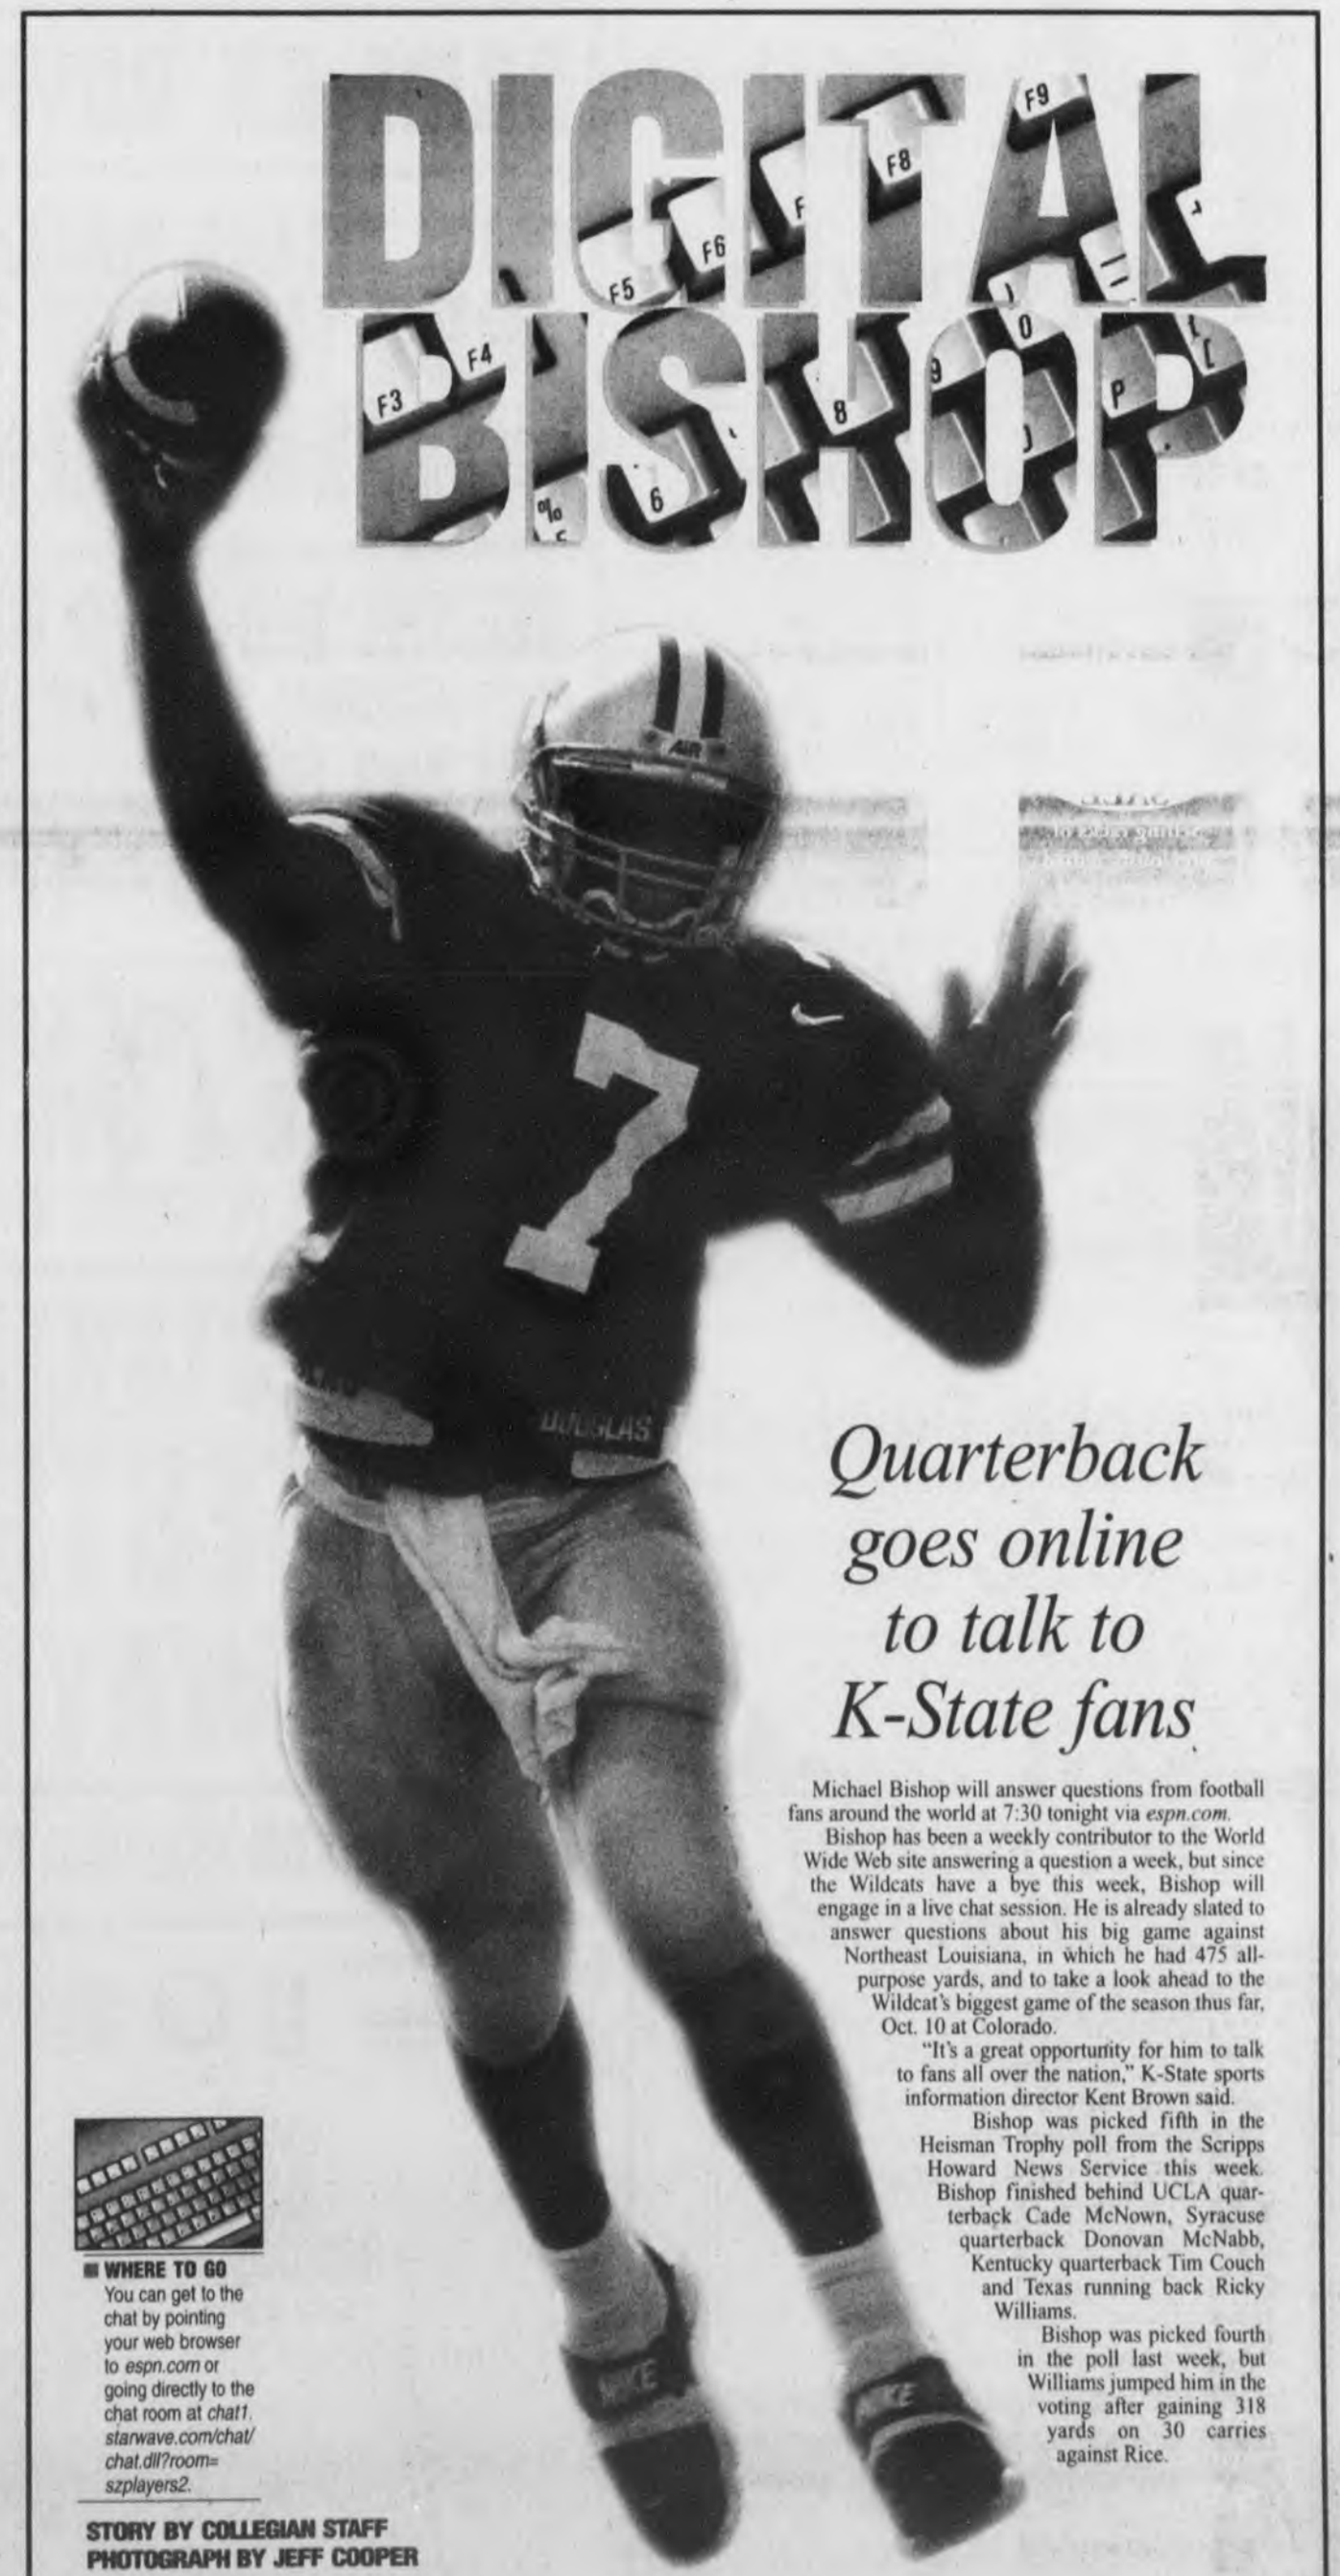
3. Iowa St +14 at Texas. I should set an over/under for Ricky Williams' total yards rushing and scoring. I'd say over 275 yards and over four scores. Is that too conservative? My pick: Texas to cover. Guest pick: Texas to cover.

4. Nebraska -27 vs. Oklahoma State at Arrowhead Stadium. What was that score last weekend against Washington? My pick: Nebraska to cover. Guest pick: Nebraska to cover.

5. Texas A&M -13 at Kansas. Rock chalk, chickenhawk, (to heck with) KU. UAB was so close last week. My pick: Texas A&M to cover. Guest pick: Texas A&M to cover.

6. Wisconsin -8.5 at Indiana. Indiana in a blowout. Oh wait. This isn't basketball. My pick: Wisconsin to cover. Guest pick: Wisconsin to cover.

7. Arizona State +2.5 at USC. There are four certain things: 1. Death. 2. Taxes. 3. I'll never pick Kansas, Oklahoma or UCLA. 4. I'll never pick against K-State or USC. My pick: USC to cover. Guest pick: Arizona State to cover.



8. Colorado -3.5 at Oklahoma. See game No. 7. My pick: Colorado to cover. Guest pick: Oklahoma to cover.

9. Baylor +12.5 at Texas Tech. I feel like an idiot for thinking the Bears will cover. No, I take that back. I feel like an idiot for getting beat by a woman. My pick: Baylor to cover. Guest pick: Baylor to cover.

10. Arizona +2 at Washington. I don't think the Huskies are anywhere near as good as people thought they were heading into Nebraska last week. But they are good enough to take their embarrassment and aggression out on Arizona. My pick: Washington to cover. Guest pick: Arizona to cover.

Think we're wrong? Think you know all 10 games? Always dreamed of being a guest picker? Need relationship advice? Drop me an e-mail.

Quarterback goes online to talk to K-State fans

Michael Bishop will answer questions from football fans around the world at 7:30 tonight via espn.com.

Bishop has been a weekly contributor to the World Wide Web site answering a question a week, but since the Wildcats have a bye this week, Bishop will engage in a live chat session. He is already slated to answer questions about his big game against Northeast Louisiana, in which he had 475 all-purpose yards, and to take a look ahead to the Wildcat's biggest game of the season thus far, Oct. 10 at Colorado.

"It's a great opportunity for him to talk to fans all over the nation," K-State sports information director Kent Brown said.

Bishop was picked fifth in the Heisman Trophy poll from the Scripps Howard News Service this week. Bishop finished behind UCLA quarterback Cade McNown, Syracuse quarterback Donovan McNabb, Kentucky quarterback Tim Couch and Texas running back Ricky Williams.

Bishop was picked fourth in the poll last week, but Williams jumped him in the voting after gaining 318 yards on 30 carries against Rice.

WHERE TO GO
You can get to the chat by pointing your web browser to espn.com or going directly to the chat room at chat1.starwave.com/chat/chat.dll?room=szplayers2.

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL PLAYOFF ROUNDUP

Smoltz, Tucker lead Atlanta to Game 1 win against Cubs

ATLANTA — John Smoltz's dominating performance on the mound was expected. Michael Tucker's power at the plate wasn't.

Smoltz became the winningest pitcher in postseason history, allowing only five hits in 7 2/3 innings as the Atlanta Braves cruised to a 7-1 victory over the Chicago Cubs in Game 1 of the NL division series Wednesday.

"He's just straight nasty this time of year," said Ryan Klesko, who turned the game into a rout with a seventh-inning grand slam. "We jumped on them early and John shut them down."

Tucker, who had just two home runs in the past three months and was dropped to eighth in the batting order, got the offense going with a two-run homer in the second inning.

"The second half of the season was pretty depressing," Tucker said. "But you have to put the regular season behind you. This is the postseason. You have to look ahead."

Klesko made it 7-0 with his grand slam, but the runs really weren't needed with Smoltz on the mound. He pushed his record to 11-3 in 21 postseason starts, breaking the record for wins shared with Whitey Ford and Dave Stewart.

"It's been a magical career, having the opportunity to pitch in so many postseason games," Smoltz said.

He was picked to begin the best-of-5 series based on his playoff success and a 12-1 record in the second half of the season. The Braves' pitching is so deep they have 20-game winner Tom Glavine and four-time Cy Young winner Greg Maddux ready to go in the next two games.

Smoltz was 17-3 and had the best winning percentage in the majors during the regular season — a remarkable performance considering he had elbow surgery in December and went on the disabled list twice early in the season.

"Many times this season, I was thinking I wouldn't be able to make my next start," Smoltz said.

The Cubs, weary from a three-team wild-card race and forced to win a one-game playoff against San Francisco on Monday, were in a full-scale letdown mode, going down meekly in their first playoff game since 1989.

"It wasn't discouraging. We just didn't get anything going," Chicago third baseman Gary Gaetti said. "I can't put my finger on it, but it was a weird atmosphere. It was not a playoff atmosphere. The crowd was quiet and it was gray kind of day."

The playoffs have become so blasé in Atlanta that Game 1 drew only 45,598 — about 4,000 short of sell-out at Turner Field. There were large sections of empty blue seats in the upper deck on a cloudy day, the fans sending the message they won't get serious until the Braves are in their fifth World Series of the 1990s.

Through the first seven innings, Smoltz allowed only one runner past first — Sammy Sosa on a seventh-inning double. Tyler Houston led off the eighth with a homer to end the shutout, and Smoltz left to a thunderous ovation after getting the next two outs.

Sosa, cheered each time he came to the plate, couldn't add to the 66 homers he hit during the regular season. He went 2-for-4.

During the regular season, the Cubs had more success against the Braves than any NL team, winning six of nine games. But the postseason is more familiar to Atlanta, which has won an unprecedented seven straight division titles.

Unknown rookie makes name for self in Yankees 3-1 victory

NEW YORK — Add the name of Shane Spencer to the long list of New York Yankees legends.

An unknown a month ago, the compact rookie capped his amazing September by homering in his first postseason at-bat to lead Andy Pettitte and the Yankees past the Texas Rangers 3-1 Wednesday night for a 2-0 lead in their AL division series.

Pettitte atoned for a season-long struggle and pitched perfectly into the fifth inning. Texas led the league in batting this year, but managed only five hits in a Game 1 shutout and got only five more against the AL's top staff.

The Yankees will try to sweep the best-of-5 playoff on Friday night at Texas. David Cone (20-7) starts for New York against Aaron Sele (19-11).

Spencer got his chance to start in left field partly because of an ominous medical report on Darryl Strawberry. Told that doctors had "found something" on his colon, Strawberry left the team for more tests Thursday. It is not known when he will rejoin the Yankees.

Spencer seemed to catch the Rangers by surprise, much the same way he startled Yankees fans with his power down the stretch.

He hit a solo home run off Rick Helling in the second inning, then singled ahead of Scott Brosius' homer for a 3-0 lead in the fourth.

The sellout crowd of 57,360 rewarded the rookie with standing ovations all night, the way fans used to respond to the likes of Reggie and Mickey. At 26, the humble, aw-shucks Spencer had to be urged by his teammates to take a curtain call.

Spencer had spent eight full seasons in the minors before finally getting his chance in the majors this year. He made three roundtrips between Triple-A Columbus and New York.

Promoted for a fourth time on Aug. 31, he hit eight home runs in September and three grand slams — joining Babe Ruth, Lou Gehrig and Joe DiMaggio among the seven players in team history to hit three slams in an entire year.

Spencer, who hit 119 homers in the minors, earned AL player of the week honors for hitting six homers in the last week, but his home run against Texas drew the biggest cheer yet.

Helling, who emerged to tie for the league lead with 20 wins, struck out three of New York's first six batters and threw two fastballs past Spencer for called strikes. On a 2-2 pitch, however, Spencer launched a drive over the 399-foot marker in left-center field for the game's first run.

Spencer quickly ran around the bases with his head down, nearly running past home plate when he arrived. The Yankees spilled out of the dugout to greet New York's newest hero.

Spencer did it just the way they teach in the minors in his next at-bat, grounding a hard single up the middle. Brosius followed with a drive over the wall in right-center.

With his big "1.000" average still posted on the scoreboard, Spencer took a called third strike in his final at-bat.

Pettitte protected the lead, setting down the first 12 batters with ease. Juan Gonzalez doubled to begin the fifth and later scored on a single by Ivan Rodriguez for Texas' only run.

Pettitte gave up three hits in seven innings, striking out eight and walking none.

He improved to 6-0 lifetime at home against Texas and ended a slide in which he won just four of his last 12 starts, leaving his spot in the postseason rotation in doubt.

Jeff Nelson got two outs in the eighth and Mariano Rivera closed for his second save of the series.

Indians lose pitcher, manager but pull out Game 2 victory

CLEVELAND — Maybe losing their manager, their starting pitcher and their cool in the first inning was just what these Cleveland Indians needed.

Dave Burba, rushed into service when starter Dwight Gooden was ejected after 22 pitches, made it into the sixth inning, and David Justice homered and drove in four runs Wednesday as Cleveland defeated Boston 9-5 to even the AL playoff series.

After being routed 11-3 in Game 1, the Indians needed a lift. And although they certainly didn't plan to spend the rest of the day watching television in Cleveland's clubhouse, manager Mike Hargrove and Gooden sparked the Indians and their fans by getting kicked out in the first by plate umpire Joe Brinkman.

"It sure did get us fired up," Cleveland first baseman Jim Thome said. "Especially since the last week or so we haven't played real well. And with the way they played yesterday, we needed something."

The best-of-5 series continues Friday afternoon at Fenway Park with Cleveland's Charles Nagy facing Bret Saberhagen. Game 4 is set for Saturday, and the teams would return to Jacobs Field for Game 5 on Sunday, if necessary.

Game 2 will be best remembered for a wild, 39-minute first inning that included three runs, the ejections, two passed balls, three walks, two stolen bases, a hit batter, two controversial calls and a lot of heated words.

There was more tension in the ninth when both benches and bullpens emptied briefly after John Valentin took exception to an inside pitch from Indians reliever Mike Jackson, who picked up the save.

Mo Vaughn, who had a postseason record seven RBIs in Game 1, went 1-for-4 with two strikeouts and a walk.

Gooden, seeking his first postseason win, was in trouble with Brinkman after his third pitch. He disagreed with the umpire on a 2-0 pitch to leadoff hitter Darren Lewis, yelling when Brinkman called ball three.

The umpire started out from behind the plate as Gooden motioned to him that things were OK and he would continue. Hargrove came out to calm his pitcher, but on his way back to the bench, he argued with Brinkman and was quickly tossed.

"For me, it's one of those things that happens in the heat of battle where everybody's competitive, especially in this situation," Hargrove said. "It was just a difference of opinion. I did what I had to do, and Joe did what he had to do."

Gooden walked the first two hitters, but after striking out Vaughn, Nomar Garciaparra doubled high off the wall in left. Darren Lewis and Valentin scored on the hit, although TV replays showed Valentin was thrown out.

When Brinkman called him safe, Gooden, who was backing up the play, said something to the umpire, who immediately ejected him. Gooden had to be restrained by several teammates as he tried to get at Brinkman.

"I didn't even know I got thrown out until I got back to the mound and the other umpires told me," Gooden said.

Brinkman released a statement through the AL.

"The ejection of Hargrove was questioning balls and strikes," he said. "The ejection on Gooden was that he screamed an expletive right in my ear and I ejected him. That's all there is to it."

Burba, who started 31 games for the Indians in the regular season and was named a long reliever following past success in that role, replaced Gooden and retired the side. Burba then held the

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL PLAYOFF ROUNDUP

Smoltz, Tucker lead Atlanta to Game 1 win against Cubs

ATLANTA — John Smoltz's dominating performance on the mound was expected. Michael Tucker's power at the plate wasn't.

Smoltz became the winningest pitcher in postseason history, allowing only five hits in 7 2/3 innings as the Atlanta Braves cruised to a 7-1 victory over the Chicago Cubs in Game 1 of the NL division series Wednesday.

"He's just straight nasty this time of year," said Ryan Klesko, who turned the game into a rout with a seventh-inning grand slam. "We jumped on them early and John shut them down."

Tucker, who had just two home runs in the past three months and was dropped to eighth in the batting order, got the offense going with a two-run homer in the second inning.

"The second half of the season was pretty depressing," Tucker said. "But you have to put the regular season behind you. This is the postseason. You have to look ahead."

Klesko made it 7-0 with his grand slam, but the runs really weren't needed with Smoltz on the mound. He pushed his record to 11-3 in 21 postseason starts, breaking the record for wins shared with Whitey Ford and Dave Stewart.

"It's been a magical career, having the opportunity to pitch in so many postseason games," Smoltz said.

He was picked to begin the best-of-5 series based on his playoff success and a 12-1 record in the second half of the season. The Braves' pitching is so deep they have 20-game winner Tom Glavine and four-time Cy Young winner Greg Maddux ready to go in the next two games.

Smoltz was 17-3 and had the best winning percentage in the majors during the regular season — a remarkable performance considering he had elbow surgery in December and went on the disabled list twice early in the season.

"Many times this season, I was thinking I wouldn't be able to make my next start," Smoltz said.

The Cubs, weary from a three-team wild-card race and forced to win a one-game playoff against San Francisco on Monday, were in a full-scale letdown mode, going down meekly in their first playoff game since 1989.

"It wasn't discouraging. We just didn't get anything going," Chicago third baseman Gary Gaetti said. "I can't put my finger on it, but it was a weird atmosphere. It was not a playoff atmosphere. The crowd was quiet and it was gray kind of day."

The playoffs have become so blasé in Atlanta that Game 1 drew only 45,598 — about 4,000 short of sellout at Turner Field. There were large sections of empty blue seats in the upper deck on a cloudy day, the fans sending the message they won't get serious until the Braves are in their fifth World Series of the 1990s.

Through the first seven innings, Smoltz allowed only one runner past first — Sammy Sosa on a seventh-inning double. Tyler Houston led off the eighth with a homer to end the shutout, and Smoltz left to a thunderous ovation after getting the next two outs.

Sosa, cheered each time he came to the plate, couldn't add to the 66 homers he hit during the regular season. He went 2-for-4.

During the regular season, the Cubs had more success against the Braves than any NL team, winning six of nine games. But the postseason is more familiar to Atlanta, which has won an unprecedented seven straight division titles.

Unknown rookie makes name for self in Yankees 3-1 victory

NEW YORK — Add the name of Shane Spencer to the long list of New York Yankees legends.

An unknown a month ago, the compact rookie capped his amazing September by homering in his first postseason at-bat to lead Andy Pettitte and the Yankees past the Texas Rangers 3-1 Wednesday night for a 2-0 lead in their AL division series.

Pettitte atoned for a season-long struggle and pitched perfectly into the fifth inning. Texas led the league in batting this year, but managed only five hits in a Game 1 shutout and got only five more against the AL's top staff.

Global recession likely in today's economic climate

■ Loss of millions of jobs, $600 billion worldwide, cause for concern in U.S.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Worldwide economic turmoil has cost millions of jobs and more than $600 billion in output — the equivalent of a country the size of Canada shutting down for a year, a spokesperson for the International Monetary Fund said Wednesday. The agency also warned that global recession can't be ruled out especially if the U.S. economy weakens more than expected.

In a sobering assessment, the IMF slashed its economic forecast, predicting the global economy will slow to a 2 percent growth rate this year, the poorest showing in seven years. The world's economy will only slightly rebound to 2.5 percent growth in 1999, a spokesperson said.

Both figures were a full percentage point below IMF estimates made just five months ago.

And even that marked-down forecast might not come to pass, the IMF warned, given the spreading financial turmoil that began 14 months ago in Asia, leveled the Russian economy last month and is now threatening Latin American countries.

Employing unusually blunt language for an agency that normally searches for a silver lining to any economic cloud, the IMF warned: "Chances of any significant improvement in 1999 have also diminished and the risks of a deeper, wider and more prolonged downturn have escalated."

Just a year ago, the IMF forecast that the global economy would expand by 4.3 percent this year, right in line with the long-term growth trend over the past 25 years. But at that time the Asian crisis had not spread from Thailand.

The IMF, which has assembled more than $100 billion in bailout packages for Thailand, Indonesia, South Korea and Russia, has been forced to steadily downgrade its economic forecasts as the crisis has intensified.

The human cost already has been significant; Millions of people have been thrown out of work in the hardest hit Asian countries, where economies have plunged to depression-like levels.

The lost world output for just 1998 would be between $600 billion to $800 billion, a IMF spokesperson said.

The situation in Asia has become so serious it threatens to unravel decades of economic gains by tens of millions of people in the region, a World Bank representant said earlier this week.

In the United States, the biggest effect has been an escalating trade deficit as American factories and farmers have seen their foreign markets dry up. The broadest measure of U.S. trade will surge from a deficit of $155 billion last year to $236 billion this year, the IMF spokesperson said, and to $299 billion in 1999, a level it called unsustainable.

The agency forecast U.S. economic growth will slow only slightly to 3.5 percent this year but will drop to just 2 percent in 1999 as lost exports and rising imports eat further into U.S. growth.

Because of this slowdown, IMF chief economist Michael Mussa said it was appropriate the Federal Reserve cut a key interest rate by a quarter-point on Tuesday, an action widely viewed as a pre-emptive strike against a possible U.S. recession.

The chance that the United States could slow more than expected, that Japan could fail to deal with its worst recession in 50 years and that skittish investors will permanently flee Latin America and other emerging markets are the biggest threats raising the possibility the current slowdown could deepen into a global recession.

"It is a risk which policy makers around the world need to be concerned about," Mussa said.

The United States has been working behind the scenes with the IMF and major allies to assemble a bailout package for Brazil. The U.S. fears that if Latin America's largest economy falls victim to investor flight, that could trigger more failures in Latin America, a region that buys nearly 20 percent of U.S. companies' exports.

The IMF spokesperson said all the turmoil will result in a plunge in the flow of private capital to emerging market countries this year to the lowest level since 1990.

Veterinary school helps Good Samaritan cases

BY AMANDA EWING
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pet owners know when their animal is sick or injured, they should take it to the vet. Not all animals, however, have the luxury of loving owners.

Many animals, such as abandoned pets, orphaned baby animals and other wildlife, have to rely on the kindness of strangers. These animals can find the help they need to survive at the K-State Veterinary Medicine Complex.

"Good Samaritans (cases) are any wild animal that is injured or found and brought in by the public," said Linda Rohs, the complex's director of client services. "They can be baby birds knocked out of nests, babies that are abandoned, injured animals hit by cars, or any injured wild animal or an animal with no seeming owner."

Rohs said 100-200 Good Samaritan cases are treated each year. Some species are seen more often than others, she said.

"We get a lot of domestic rabbits," Rohs said. "School gets out and students leave their rabbits. It's a real problem."

Snakes, turtles and squirrels also are frequent Good Samaritan cases, as are mice that are rescued from cats. Rohs said chickens also have been brought in for treatment after games between the University of Kansas and K-State.

"We usually have to put them to sleep because they've been dyed so badly," Rohs said.

Dr. Cornelia Ketz, intern of exotic animal, wildlife and zoo animal medicine services, said the doctors make evaluations on each individual case.

"We do a physical exam to see how bad they are injured," Ketz said. "We give them time to get stabilized and calm down, and we make a decision within 24 to 48 hours."

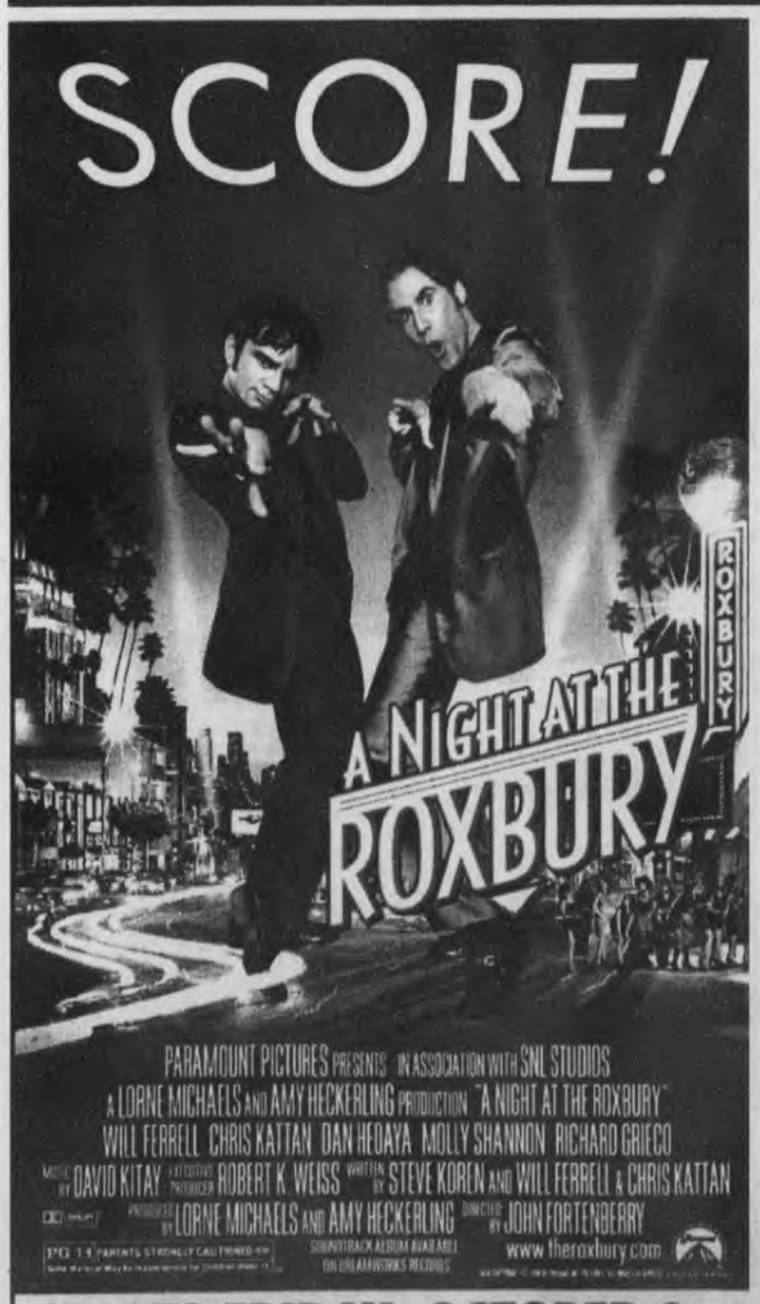
Rohs said chickens also have been brought in for treatment after games between the University of Kansas and K-State. "We usually have to put them to sleep because they've been dyed so badly," Rohs said.

The deciding factor of whether or not to give treatment, especially for wild animals, is whether the animal can be cured in order to be re-released. Ketz said if there is no improvement within the first two days, the animal is euthanized to stop its suffering.

If an animal does show improvement it is treated and put into rehabilitation where it can be reintroduced into the wild. Ketz said it's important for people to bring in injured wildlife so those animals can be rehabilitated by professionals.

"People always have the tendency to try and raise animals because they're cute," Ketz said. "Wildlife haven't had a chance to get domesticated. Even if an animal is so-called 'tame,' it still has wild instincts that break through."

Some of the injured animals, such as dogs and cats, can be adopted. Rohs said strays are turned over to the local animal shelter.



She also said injured animals can be adopted if the person is willing to pay the medical bills.

"It's agreeable if they say they're willing to pay the charges and adopt the animal," Rohs said. "It doesn't happen very often."

After its success with last season's production of "The Sutherland," the theater department's Ebony Theatre Company will open a new production tonight.

MORE INFO?
When: Oct. 1-3 8 p.m.
Where: Purple Masque Theater in the East Stadium
Tickets: $3 for students
$5 general public at McCain Auditorium box office.

Alice Childress' "Wine in the Wilderness" begins with a performance at 8 p.m., followed by shows at 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday in the Purple Masque Theatre.

Set in Harlem, in 1964, the play begins just as a riot is winding down. Bill Jameson, an artist preparing a showing of his work, has three paintings that capture what he calls "the ideal expression of black womanhood."

Jameson wishes to use his work to show his ideas of innocence, strength and society's effect on the black woman. As the first act unfolds, the artist's friends have just brought him a subject for approval — "a messed-up chick" who could help Jameson finish his project.

"This play was originally produced as a teleplay, and it was very successful," said Marci Maullar, associate professor of speech, theater and dance, and Ebony Theatre Company's adviser.

Funny at one moment and tender the next, this play examines the subjects of womanhood and beauty — inside and out — as Jameson learns what it means to be truly beautiful.

Donna Davenport, senior in theater and women's studies, is directing the production and has taken on the duties of heading the Ebony Theatre Company. Davenport said the cast and crew have worked long hours to ensure a glitch-free opening night.

"Working with this cast is a lot of fun, and it's helped me sharpen my acting skills," Davenport said. "You have to think about what processes to go through to create a character."

Student theater leadership brings company back to life

For more than two decades, the Ebony Theatre Company has provided an opportunity for black students to interact artistically and for the campus as a whole to view a variety of productions.

Started in 1977 by graduate student Ann Butler and other faculty members in the theater department, the company receives a financial allotment each year from the Fine Arts Council to use on productions.

This group was created as a way to give black artists on campus opportunities for expression.

"One of the main reasons I came to K-State was because of Ebony Theatre," Donna Davenport, senior in theater and women's studies, said.

Davenport said K-State was the only university among the former Big 8 Conference that had an individual multicultural theater program, and that K-State's program is still the only one of its kind in the Midwest.

Marci Maullar, associate professor of speech communication, theater and dance, said after years of production the company was dormant for almost a 1-1/2 years because of the lack of possible directors.

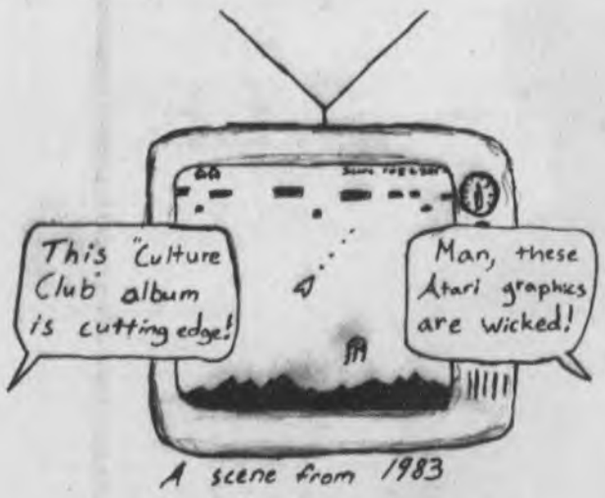
The group came back to life with last season's "The Sutherland," directed by Davenport. Maullar said the play was well-received and the group was revived.

"The company needed a new leader," Maullar said. "We needed a student knowledgeable in theater to handle direction."

Davenport will display her directorial skills in "Wine in the Wilderness," the Ebony Theatre production opening today.

In this play, the characters explore their ideas of black womanhood, strength and beauty and the relationships between them.

Because Davenport is planning to graduate in May, the group is looking for a director for next season.



Opportunities to direct the group are open to qualified students. The position of faculty adviser is open as well.

"We are possibly looking to hire an adviser of color in the future, when funds are available," Maullar said. "We want this to be a strong program."

Stellar cast, intense plot make 'Ronin' a must-see

BY RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Movie Review
★★★★ out of 5

The legacy of 1970s cinema is alive and well-represented in director John Frankenheimer's new film, "Ronin."

Stocked with the powerful cast of Robert De Niro, Jean Reno, Stellan Skarsgaard, Michael Lonsdale and Jonathan Pryce, "Ronin" is an action film in the truest sense.

The relentless pursuit is for a small silver case containing an unknown object that is desired by a great many people but mainly "the Russians" and "the Irish."

De Niro, Reno, Skarsgaard and company are recruited by an Irish woman, played by Natascha McElhone, to steal the case from a gang of suave, sinister internationals traveling around France.

Trust is breached, friends are betrayed and De Niro and Reno are left to fend for themselves. Could anyone, possibly Ingmar Bergman, have dreamed up a finer and subtler action buddy duo? Forget the one-note high jinks of Jackie Chan and Chris Tucker in "Rush Hour," De Niro and Reno are more than mere stereotypical action stars.

From the film's start, actions, not words, reveal the characters for who and what they are — poseurs or professionals. When the hit men (the Japanese word, Ronin, means masterless samurai driven to shame) gather on the banks of the Seine to make a questionable weapons deal, intuition is everything.

We get a glimpse of the cut-throat decision-making a contemporary samurai must brave as the wiser De Niro refuses to ignore his reservations ("There is no doubt if you're in doubt.").

As hit men, De Niro and Reno possess the ambiguity the world has come to represent. It's a world where there is no clear good side, where money buys instant terrorism and governments no longer function as sole players in international policy.

What makes all of this possible, in an image-weary time with a typically blasé film-going crowd, is the complete lack of gimmickry.

Even recent James Bond films suffer from the splashy and unnecessary use of technical gadgets and over-staged action sequences that end in Hollywood-style explosions. And summer action movies tend to reach levels of absurdity unknown even to children.

The intensity of "Ronin" recalls the late 1960s and 1970s, which brought a level of personal sensitivity to film that is rare today except in European films. It's no surprise Frankenheimer directed "The Manchurian Candidate."

In "Ronin", action is not the reward for sitting through occasional spurts of simple plot development but the excitement of watching these street-savvy actors chew up the script.

Education.

But it would be charged with such things as developing a coordinated budget for all post-secondary institutions to present to the governor and Legislature, exploring opportunities for mergers and affiliations among existing institutions, and serving as a referee to resolve disputes among the schools.

The proposal and Docking's reaction to it elated Lt. Gov. Gary Sherrer, co-chairman of the task force, and Rep. David Adkins, R-Leawood, who served as chairman of a special House of Representatives committee that developed a plan last legislative session. That plan passed the House and died in the Senate.

"It was pretty remarkable," Sherrer said of the day's events. "While I could quibble with some of the details in the presidents' plan, I thought it was an excellent document. I sense that people have begun to move to some kind of common ground on this issue."

Sherrer said the task force was inviting all stakeholders in the higher education governance debate to submit their plans or ideas for the next meeting.

"We're going to put all the proposals on the table, and we're going to hammer out a plan," he said.

"I think we're going to have something on paper to hand off to the governor by the end of November."

Adkins agreed. "Frankly, I don't think we're that far from being able to articulate consensus (on a plan)," he said. "We've had a transition from the philosophical approach to a more specific policy focus, which is very helpful."

Adkins called the presidents' consensus on a plan "an unprecedented level of grassroots leadership."

"Generally, the stakeholders in higher education have been much more reactive to legislative proposals. To me, it's a significant development that they have decided to be part of the solution instead of part of the problem."

Docking said, "We feel we've done a good job for the students, the taxpayers and the people of Kansas, but times change. We want to be an active part of shaping (any reorganization)."

Docking said the regents could accept assigning to a state coordinating agency the functions of pulling together a coordinated higher education budget, doing master planning, reviewing affiliation and merger proposals, developing off-campus course and program policies, and performing the role of dispute mediator.

Adkins called the presidents' consensus on a plan "an unprecedented level of grassroots leadership."

"I am real confident with the ones he identified," Sherrer said of Docking's list of things the regents could accept.

One controversial issue the presidents' plan did not address was whether to take the community colleges and vocational-technical schools away from Board of Education supervision.

Sherrer said he favors creating a community college trustees council to oversee the two-year colleges, taking them away from the Board of Education but not putting them under the regents.

come from Social Security money. I think Social Security money should be left in Social Security."

Ryun countered that the GOP plan passed by the House "is not a tax of any kind on Social Security." He accused Clark of "just trying to scare our senior citizens." Clark said the $1.6 trillion is only an estimate and might not materialize. "I'm just using good economic sense," he said of his argument.

On the low prices farmers are experiencing, Clark said the Freedom to Farm Act championed by Kansas Sen. Pat Roberts is the culprit, because Congress failed to recognize the effect of foreign markets when it was passed. Ryun said the Clinton administration was to blame for not opening up foreign markets for farmers to sell their products.

Ryun said he voted against a campaign-finance reform bill, because it did not "level the playing field enough" between incumbents and challengers. Clark said disclosure of who pays for third-party political advertising is desperately needed and now "government is bought and paid for by special interests."

Tiller's challenge dismissed

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — State officials and activists on both sides of the issue are not going to get a definitive ruling anytime soon on what the new Kansas abortion law really says.

The Kansas Supreme Court on Wednesday dismissed a challenge to the law filed by Dr. George Tiller, of Wichita, the state's best-known abortion provider. The court's order, less than two pages long, was signed by Chief Justice Kay McFarland.

The court said it saw "no case or actual controversy" because no one, including Tiller, has been prosecuted for violating the law. Its ruling came the same day the state Board of Healing Arts ended an investigation of Tiller by deciding not to pursue any disciplinary action.

The Supreme Court noted that legislators are reviewing the law and may consider changes during their 1999 session.

The law, which took effect July 1, bans most late-term abortions and establishes new reporting requirements for doctors who perform them. It also restricts the use of a specific procedure the law describes as "partial-birth" abortion.

Some legislators and many activists on both sides believe provisions in the law conflict. Shortly after he signed the legislation, Graves said he did not think most legislators knew what was in it.

Tiller said that parts of the law are unconstitutional because they are vague and that the reporting requirement would force doctors to incriminate themselves in dealings with the state.

Tiller's attorneys, Lee Thompson and Rachael Pirner, issued a statement saying the doctor still could file his challenge in a district court or drop it for the time being. They said he has not made a decision.

"By declining jurisdiction, the court did not rule on the merits or the substance of Dr. Tiller's case," the lawyers said in their statement.

The decision pleased Dave Gittrich, executive director of Kansans for Life, the state's largest pro-life group. He said Tiller was asking the court to invalidate the law before there was any attempt at enforcement.

"I didn't think the Supreme Court would ever take this thing," Gittrich said.

Saudis ask oil companies for assistance

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — For the first time in a quarter-century, Saudi Arabia is seeking out U.S. oil companies to help develop the kingdom's vast energy reserves — dramatic evidence of a changing global oil market marked by low prices and tough competition.

Saudi officials began talks with seven U.S. oil companies to explore ways for Americans to invest in the kingdom's oil industry, including exploration and production.

Industry experts expect the process to take a year or more — and even then, it may not be a certainty.

But the overture by Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah in a private meeting with oil executives over the weekend was the first time the Saudis have sought outside participation since the kingdom nationalized its oil industry in 1973.

No foreign companies have been involved in exploration or production in Saudi Arabia since then.

The Saudis' direct approach caught some oil executives by surprise. But industry analysts and Middle East scholars said it wasn't unexpected.

The Saudis "desperately need capital to invest in their oil sector to keep the oil flowing," said Yehya Sadowski, associate professor of Middle East studies at Johns Hopkins University.

The Saudis' financial problems are exacerbated by low oil prices, growing competition from other oil producers such as Venezuela and Mexico, and slack demand, made worse by the economic crisis in Asia.

Some of Saudi Arabia's neighbors are seeking foreign investment as well, despite concern about the political backlash from Islamic nationalists. Iran has sought bids for at least 40 oil and gas development projects, and Kuwait is said to be holding private, preliminary discussions on foreign investment.

In Saudi Arabia, Abdullah has essentially headed the government since 1995, when his half-brother, King Fahd, had a stroke.

He told oil executives he wants "recommendations and suggestions" on what role they might play in developing new and existing Saudi oil fields, according to Saudi sources.

The U.S. companies were cautious in their comments, fearing they might antagonize the Saudis, who would like the issue to have a low profile.

"I didn't comment before the meeting. I can't comment now," said Ed Burwell, a spokesman for Exxon Corp.

Rec Report

Recreational Services' Offices Located in Peters Recreation Complex

A Better Way of Life at the Rec

Feeling bored with your workout routine? Want to know how your favorite activities can be incorporated into your daily workout schedule? Then visit Recreational Services' Wellness Resource Center, located on the main level of the Rec Complex. In addition to designing exercise and fitness programs, the center also offers nutritional assessments and sub VO2 max estimates, as well as determining body fat, flexibility, blood pressure, muscular strength and muscular endurance.

"Normally when someone comes in for a fitness consultation, we do a variety of tests for them. We cater to what the individual wants to learn about their own personal wellness," said Lori Strack, student assistant for the center. Strack said the main goal of the center is to increase the need for lifelong fitness in people. "It's much easier to start a fitness routine when you are younger and healthier," she said. "By keeping fit, you build self-esteem, strength, endurance and a better way of life. All of our programs are designed to enable you to have a healthier lifestyle."

"In the center, we are able to assess a person's physical condition, as well as give nutritional and exercise information," Mike LaPlaca, fitness consultant, said. "We offer safe and effective workouts tailored to the individual needs of each person."

The services of the Rec's fitness consultants have grown as they are becoming more popular to Rec users. "We had fitness consultants before the renovation, but in the fall of 1995, we opened the Wellness Resource Center and hired more fitness consultants to better serve users of the facility," said Derek Walters, associate director of Rec Services.

The center already has served 50 to 75 people since the beginning of the semester. Five fitness consultants currently staff the center. Strack, who is working on a master's degree in kinesiology, said the other four fitness consultants are all undergraduates in their senior year studying either nutrition and exercise or kinesiology. "The fitness consultants all must have completed certain required classes in their majors in order to work in the center," Strack said. "The interview process for hiring also tests their abilities to administer the various tests offered by the center. The center gives students a great opportunity to challenge their abilities and knowledge learned in their classes."

"Working in the center gives you the hands-on knowledge to follow up on what you've learned in the books. It makes you recall what you've learned in your classes and practice it," LaPlaca said. "It's exciting when you can actually answer questions and put your knowledge to work."

The center plans to incorporate several new ideas to increase awareness of the center and its services. Strack said there are plans to update the information available to Rec users. "We would also like to design packets for people just starting out in their nutritional and fitness programs. If we can get people into the center to see what we have to offer, we hope to develop a relationship where they will keep returning every four to six weeks for check-backs to keep them motivated in their fitness programs," Strack said.

Strack encourages anyone to stop in for a visit or call the center at 532-6950 for more information. The center is located to the right of the Intramural Gallery entrance. Signs are posted on the center's windows and door to direct Rec users. Information about the center is also available on the Rec Services home page at www.recservices.ksu.edu.

Who's h@ the Rec

Jared Jackson, senior in finance, has worked for Recreational Services for four years. During his first two years at K-State, Jackson officiated all intramural sports. These past two years, he has served as Intramural Supervisor. During his four years working at the Rec, Jackson has enjoyed getting to know the people who work at and use the Rec. "I've met a lot of people working at the Rec and I've made a lot of new friendships by working here, too," he said. After graduating in December, Jackson plans to pursue a career in corporate finance possibly in the Kansas City area.

Joe Wondra, senior in accounting, may be graduating in December, but he will still be around K-State as he pursues his Master's degree in accounting. In his third year of working for Rec Services, Joe is currently a building supervisor but also worked as an assistant building supervisor and a weight/fitness room supervisor. "My brother was an intramural supervisor here, and he got me interested in working for the Rec," he said. Wondra said one of his best experiences working for the Rec has been the opportunity to help people. "Being able to help people and answer their questions has made this job rewarding," he said.

My Favorite Workout

Keisha Grosdidier, freshman, sets a great example for other freshman wanting to bridge the gap between high school sports and lifelong fitness. "Since I don't play sports as much anymore, I am now trying to work toward fitness for the rest of my life. Now my workout is based on different things, especially overall fitness," she said. Grosdidier said her workout usually consists of 20 minutes on the step machine, weights and abdominal exercises. Recently, she has been attending an aerobics class with a kick-boxing segment offered Thursdays at 8:30 p.m. Another Rec Services' program that she has used is the Wellness Resource Center. She said she initially stopped by the center for a fitness evaluation and liked how the trainers worked one-on-one. "The fitness consultants give you personal attention," she said. "It's great how they take the time to look at your personal health profile and evaluate your fitness needs." Grosdidier advises other freshman to jump into the Rec scene and find a workout that interests them. "I recommend for all freshman to go see what the Rec is all about. There are so many programs to try and you don't have to be a world class athlete either," she said.

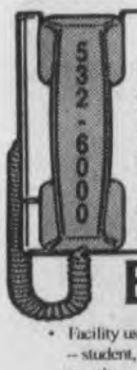
Lafene Displays at the Rec

Lafene Student Health will sponsor a special information display in the Rec Mall Tuesday, October 27, from 4-7 p.m. Topics covered will be flu clinic and alcohol awareness week. Biofeedback information is also available every Thursday from 4-7p.m.

Faculty/Staff Volleyball

Entries will be accepted October 12-15. Leagues will be offered on Wednesdays at 6 p.m. with play beginning Wednesday, October 28. The Faculty/Staff division is open to all current and retired KSU faculty and staff, visiting professors and graduate assistants. Spouses may participate if husband and wife participate on the same team.

Fitness Facts



Because there is no wind resistance, running on a treadmill is slightly easier than running outside. To equalize things, raise the elevation by 1%. (Newsday, Jan 12, 1998)

Outdoor Rental

The Outdoor Rental Center is open through November 2 for your canoeing and camping needs. We offer a full line of tents, canoes, sleeping bags, backpacks, stoves, lanterns, etc., and our rates are very reasonable. Give us a call at 532-6894 for your equipment needs!

Free Blood Pressure Checks

Blood pressure checks can be requested in the Wellness Resource Center any time a Rec Services' fitness consultant is available.

Working It Out

What would you do if you knew of an activity that would bolster your self esteem, help you sleep better, give you more energy, control your weight, help you cope with stress and give you a chance to meet other people? These are just some of the benefits of aerobic exercise. Make Wildcat Workouts part of your regular schedule and start enjoying these benefits!

Special beginners' instructional classes are being offered. Intro to Step is scheduled for Monday, October 5, at from 6:30-7:00 p.m. and Intro to Aerobics is scheduled for Tuesday, October 6, from 6:30-7:00 p.m.

Pool Action

The decreased impact and increased resistance in water aerobics produces a unique and exciting workout. Experience the difference with Wildcat Waterworks.

- Aqua Aerobic sessions are offered Tuesday & Thrusday at noon and Monday, Tuesday and Thursday at 7:30 p.m.
- Aqua Step Aerobics sessions are offered Monday and Wednesday at noon.
- Deep Water Jogging sessions are offered Wednesday at 7:30 p.m.

Locker Rental Time

Beginning October 1, locker rentals for the fall semester will be ½ price. A locker from Oct-Dec 31 will be $6.25 for a single locker and $11.25 for a double locker. Locker rentals include towel service. Stop by the Recreational Services office during business hours, Monday-Friday, 8 a.m.-5 p.m.

Nutrition Notes

With the craze of eating low fat, non-fat and reduced fat foods, Americans have gained an average of eight pounds these last few decades. Low fat and fat free processed foods take much longer for the body to break down. Because of this, many of these foods turn out to be more fattening. Often times people forget about the amount of calories they are consuming while eating these foods. You may not be ingesting more fat, but you still need to be active in order to burn those calories. Thus, the key to eating low fat, fat free foods is moderation and regular exercise.

Fiedler, Graves to break ground for building

PHOTOGRAPH BY CLIF PALMBERG/COLLEGIAN

An artist's rendering of Fiedler Hall. Groundbreaking for the building is scheduled for 11 this morning.

BY RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Alice Fiedler and Gov. Bill Graves dig shovels into the dirt west of Rathbone Hall at 11 this morning, K-State will begin a process that will culminate in a learning facility many describe as unlike any other on campus.

Fiedler Hall will house a state-of-the-art technological library, the Department of Civil Engineering, a high-tech auditorium and small team-learning rooms wired for the information age.

The building is named for K-State alumnus George Fiedler, whose wife, Alice, contributed $5.3 million toward its construction. It marks the third and final phase of the original Durland Hall engineering complex, which had its north wing, the project's second phase, renamed Rathbone more than a year ago.

"The first floor will be an integrated knowledge nexus," said Terry King, dean of the College of Engineering. "The library and the auditorium will have the capability to be connected to anywhere live in the world."

King, now in his second year as dean, said there will be team-learning rooms, small conference room-like spaces where students can gather to study.

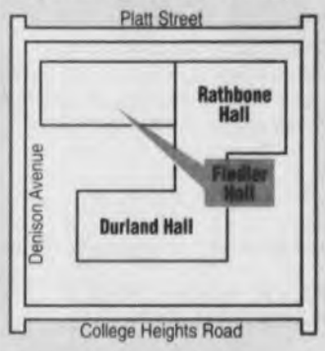
"Now, we recognize that when our students graduate they work in teams," King said. "Learning is better in teams. The first floor is really a place for learning and knowledge transfer. I think the modern view of a library will be as a node of knowledge exchange."

The library space will house Hale Library's engineering books and journals collection.

The hall commemorates the late George Fiedler's engineering career, which he began at K-State with a degree in electrical engineering in 1926 and a professional degree in 1934. Fiedler, a fellow of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, found success in the design of instrumentation and automatic controls — the sort of high technology that Fiedler Hall will represent.

Project specifics

The budget for Fiedler is nearly $12 million and is a combination of $5 million from the state, about $1.7 million in private money and Alice Fiedler's donation of $5.3 million. Plans include nearly 75,000 square feet of usable space, with 5,000 square feet of that in the library alone, bringing the engineering complex to a total of 275,000 square feet of classroom, laboratory and office space.



Don Rathbone, dean emeritus of engineering and director of the National Institute for Land Management and Training, has served on the building committee as Alice Fiedler's representative since his retirement.

"I think our complex, for our size, will compare with other institutions in the country quite well," Rathbone said. "This is going to be a tremendous addition for us."

Original plans called for $400,000 from the engineering equipment fee, a $100 fee charged to engineering students every semester that generates about $500,000 a year for general college needs, but mostly computers. That money would have purchased equipment for the library. Although a final decision has not been made, King said he didn't want to divert resources from the other college departments.

Fiedler is designed in a similar fashion to the other phases of the complex.

Fiedler Hall
Groundbreaking on the new engineering building is today.

The architect — Peckham, Guyton, Albers and Viets, of Westwood, Kan. — has wrapped the building in a mirrored glass skin but departed from the earlier building's conventions with a slight curve on the facade that fronts the auditorium.

The project is divided among three floors with the general spaces of the library, auditorium and study rooms

Senate debates fee increase for OSAS budget

BY MATT KREPS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A proposed increase in student-privilege fees was part of new business at Thursday night's Student Senate meeting.

The 4.5-percent increase request would fund higher salaries and other expenses associated with maintaining the Office of Student Activities and Services on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union.

Senators will vote on the increase at next week's meeting.

The proposed $9,039 increase would bring the total funding to more than $210,000 annually.

"Most of the increase is probably due to salary increases," OSAS Coordinator Gayle Spencer said.

Spencer said the fees break down to a 4-percent increase in full-time positions mandated by the state, a 2-percent increase for compensated officers in Student Governing Association and no increases for student staffers.

Compensated student officers include the student body president and vice president as well as the chair and vice chair of Senate, the attorney general, and the chairs of the allocations and privilege fee committees.

Spencer said staffers would be up for pay increases in the 2001-2002 budget. She said any increases in the hourly wage until then would be compensated for by a decrease of hours worked.

Housing plan aims to modernize halls

■ Facilities 2000 will remodel 10 residence halls, Jardine apartments.

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Times certainly have changed since the first housing facility, Van Zile Hall, was built in 1926.

Facilities 2000, a joint project between the Department of Housing and Dining Services and the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls, is a program to modernize the 10 residence halls and Jardine Terrace Apartments.

"We are preparing our facilities for the new millennium," said Chuck Werring, director of Housing and Dining Services. "Some of the halls have been around for 30 to 40 years. We hope to have them around for 30 to 40 more."

Werring said the program covers a span of 10 years. A portion of each resident's rental rate is allocated each year to support "behind-the-walls" maintenance such as upgrading elevators and telephone lines.

The fund also has allowed heating and air-conditioning units to be updated. For example, the cooling tower between Haymaker and Moore halls has been replaced with more modern units, and all of the air-conditioning and heating systems in the halls have been revamped to provide a more comfortable environment for students, Werring said.

Another part of Facilities 2000 that has been completed includes the addition or renovations of suites in certain halls. This project began seven years ago, the

TOM DORSEY/THE SALINA JOURNAL

Jeff Hupp, an agent with the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, leaves the mobile home in Abilene, Kan., on Thursday where authorities believe Douglas L. Bowen shot his wife and three children before committing suicide Wednesday night.

5 dead in Abilene in apparent murder-suicide

Wife, 3 girls found dead in trailer home; family had history of domestic violence

BY JOHN HANNA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ABILENE, Kan. — A young couple with a history of domestic and financial troubles and their three daughters are dead after a shooting at the family's southeast Abilene residence.

Police said the case was being investigated as a murder-suicide.

The victims were Douglas L. Bowen, 28; his wife, Sandra L. "Sandy" Bowen, 25; and their daughters, Amanda, 6; Sierra, 4; and Victoria, 2. The wife and girls were found dead in the family's trailer home Wednesday night.

Douglas Bowen, the husband and father, was found critically wounded at their mobile home from an apparent gunshot wound, said Jim Davis, Abilene public service director.

Bowen was taken by emergency helicopter to St. Francis Hospital in Wichita, where he died Thursday.

"We are now working this case as a murder-suicide," Kansas Bureau of Investigation Special Agent Scott Teeselink said.

Davis, who leads the city's police force, declined to discuss the details of the investigation but said police were not searching for suspects.

He said weapons were found in the house and police have the gun they believe was used in the shootings.

"We don't expect it to be anything other than what we believe it to be," Davis said, meaning a case of murder-suicide.

Davis said the shootings apparently occurred about 11 p.m. Wednesday and were reported by a woman who went to the residence in the trailer park a block south of the Eisenhower Center, where the President Dwight D. Eisenhower and his wife, Mamie, are buried.

The bureau sent agents to assist in the investigation and was arranging for autopsies on four of the five bodies in Topeka. An autopsy on Bowen was to be done in Wichita, Davis said.

Given the number of victims, Teeselink said he would not expect autopsy results until next week.

Records in Dickinson County District Court showed Sandra Bowen had sought a restraining order against her husband in May 1993, alleging he had attempted to cause bodily harm to her, and she had filed for divorce in June 1994. Both times, the couple apparently reconciled, because the actions were dismissed at their request.

The couple also filed for bankruptcy in federal court in Wichita last March, listing debts of $51,315 and assets of $3,926. The biggest debt was a $32,606 judgment rendered against the couple in Shawnee County District Court last December in favor of Stormont-Vail Regional Medical Center in Topeka.

The Salina attorney who handled the Bowens' bankruptcy filing, Patrick Thompson, was out of his office Thursday and not available for comment on how the Bowens acquired such a high medical debt.

Neighbors said the girls and Sandra Bowen were friendly, but Douglas Bowen did not talk much and didn't seem to make friends.

One said he liked to go out alone to bars at night.

Bowen worked for Abilene Concrete Supply, whose president, Mike Parsons, declined to discuss personal matters about Douglas Bowen.

The Bowens were married in June 1991, records showed. Two years later, Sandra Bowen sought a court order to prevent him from threatening her or causing her bodily harm. She asked that he be evicted from an apartment where the couple lived.

However, one day after filing for the order, Sandra Bowen sent a hand-written note to the court saying, "We do not want to appear in court for this matter. We want to try to work this out."

Her petition was dismissed, court records show.

A year after that, when Sandra Bowen filed for divorce in June 1994, she had moved with their first daughter, Amanda, to her hometown of Assaria, about 10 miles south of Salina.

In August of this year, the Bowens moved to the mobile home in the southeast part of the city. April Browning, a neighbor of the Bowens in the mobile home complex, said they had lived there for four months.

Browning said she had taken her two small boys to Sandra Bowen for babysitting because the park's landlord, "Told us she could use the extra money, because she was hurting a little."

Browning, who described Douglas Bowen as "really a rude man to me," said Sandra Bowen left him about three weeks ago, but went back a week later.

"I asked her if everything was going to be all right, and she said she hoped so," Browning said. "She seemed to jump when he said something."

The first time she met Douglas Bowen, Browning said, "He seemed annoyed that I was intruding. If looks could kill, I'd be dead."

Three more soldiers named in sex scandal

LEAVENWORTH, Kan. — Three more soldiers have been charged as a result of an investigation into an alleged sex scandal at Fort Leavenworth.

The three were charged Wednesday, fort spokeswoman Janet Wray said Thursday.

Charged were Sgt. Bertram Rice Jr. of Sacramento, Calif.; Spc. Shelly D. Finch of Midland, Texas; and Pvt. Amanda J. Owen of El Paso, Texas.

The charges stem from an investigation of alleged instances of improper sexual relationships among the soldiers and a prisoner at the disciplinary barracks that began in July, Wray said.

Wray said there were two alleged instances of sexual misconduct but would not elaborate on who was involved or when.

Rice was charged with conspiracy to commit obstruction of justice, fraternization, adultery and obstruction of justice.

Finch was charged with conspiracy to bring contraband into the disciplinary barracks, failure to obey an order or regulation, driving under the influence of drugs, wrongful use and possession of a controlled substance, sodomy, adultery and accepting bribes.

Owen was charged with sodomy, adultery and obstruction of justice.

If convicted of all charges, the three soldiers could face maximum penalties of dishonorable discharge and forfeiture of all pay and allowances, Wray said. In addition, Rice could face 31 years confinement, Finch could face 52 years confinement and Owen could face 14 years confinement.

Two other soldiers were charged in September with personal misconduct charges as a result of the investigation.

Wray said she did not know when expected charges against the inmate would be filed. She said the soldiers still are working at the fort but are not working with inmates.

Texas court will hear NCAA, Tech appeal

AUSTIN — The Texas Supreme Court will hear arguments in December concerning a Texas Tech football player who was ruled ineligible to play for academic reasons in 1996.

A lower court granted offensive lineman Casey Jones a temporary injunction that allowed him to finish out the 1996 season. The NCAA appealed, but the 7th Court of Appeals in Amarillo refused to act on the case since the season was over.

Now, the NCAA wants the Supreme Court to rule that the appeals court was wrong. Even though the season is over, the NCAA said the injunction was improper and wants to be able to take action against the university.

"Ultimately, we want a finding that the temporary injunction that permitted Jones to play was improperly granted," said Todd Lafferty, attorney for the NCAA.

The NCAA is not trying to punish Texas Tech but wants to be fair to the teams it played against, Lafferty said.

Lafferty said that if the Supreme Court rules in favor of the NCAA and the Jones injunction is lifted, disciplinary options include forcing Tech to forfeit games in which Jones played.

The NCAA disqualified Jones when he was a fifth-year senior because of an eligibility question related to its "75-percent rule." The rule requires student athletes to have three-quarters of their course work completed toward a major by the ninth semester.

Report says Ag office has made no progress

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Agriculture Department's civil rights office is "in disarray" and making no significant progress in clearing up a backlog of discrimination complaints by black farmers, said Roger Viadero, the department's inspector general.

Viadero recommended stripping the office of its jurisdiction and creating an outside task force to deal with the problem.

The civil rights office is making little attempt to correct the mistakes of the past, according to the report by Viadero, which was released on Thursday.

Agriculture Secretary Dan Glickman acknowledged that current and past administrations have discriminated against black farmers.

As of Sept. 11, there were 616 backlogged complaints.

The report also found an unreliable repository of information and "case files too slovenly to ensure the availability of critical documents." A picture accompanying the report shows stack upon stack of files, many uncovered and left open.

In some instances, civil rights staff members with little training were put in charge of serious complaints, the report said. Many of the adjudicators, who determine whether discrimination occurred, were student interns, it said.

"The problems we noted before ... continue," Viadero wrote, noting that Thursday's report on the civil rights office was the fifth in just over a year.

The report comes at a time when the department is already under fire because of a $3-billion federal lawsuit by more than 600 black farmers alleging discrimination after being denied farm loans and other benefits. A trial is scheduled before U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman in February.

Judge permits Jewell libel suit to proceed

NEW YORK — A federal judge has allowed a libel case brought by former Olympic Park bombing suspect Richard Jewell to proceed against The New York Post after trimming away some of its claims.

Jewell, who earlier settled with NBC and CNN, had filed a $15 million lawsuit against the Post, accusing the newspaper of libeling and defaming him.

U.S. District Court Judge Loretta A. Preska kept most of the lawsuit in place, but threw out claims that a photograph and an editorial cartoon had defamed him.

The suit alleged as libelous and defamatory a series of articles, headlines, photographs and editorial cartoons that appeared in the newspaper in the days after The Atlanta Journal-Constitution broke the story that Jewell was a suspect.

Jewell, 34, was initially portrayed as a hero for spotting a suspicious package and helping to clear people from the Olympic Park area before the July 27, 1996, explosion that killed one and injured 100 others.

Soon after, the FBI confirmed he was a suspect. He became the target of extensive media coverage until cleared by the Justice Department months later.

Study says moms can affect condom usage

ATLANTA — Teen-agers who got straight talk about safe sex from their mothers were three times more likely to use a condom their first time, a study found.

"The bottom line is that parents can make a difference," said the study's author, Kim Miller, a sociologist at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. The study was published in Thursday's issue of American Journal of Public Health.

The CDC said the findings are significant because teens who used protection their first time were 20 times more likely to use condoms in the future.

The researchers interviewed 372 sexually active teens and their mothers who lived in New York, Montgomery, Ala., and San Juan, Puerto Rico. Fathers were not interviewed.

Of the 372 teen-agers questioned, 122 teens had discussed safe sex with their mothers before having sex, while 250 either never talked about condom use with their mothers or did so after they had lost their virginity.

In the first group, 3.4 teens used a condom for every one who didn't — roughly three times the rate of condom use in the second group, where only 1.2 used a condom for every one who didn't.

Mothers talked about condoms with boys at an average age of 12.9. Girls' talks came slightly later, at 13.5. The average age at which teens said they first had sex was 13.8.

The authors used their research to rebuke conservative groups who want lessons on safe sex removed from sex education in schools.

"Programs that emphasize abstinence only may not prepare adolescents and young adults to use condoms for their first sexual experience," the researchers said. "And this, in turn, may increase the likelihood that they will later engage in unprotected, and thus risky, sexual behavior."

Shoppers filter in and out of the Eddie Bauer store on its first day of business Thursday afternoon in Manhattan Town Center. The Manhattan store is one of more than 400 sportswear stores nationwide specializing in casual wear and travel gear.

Eddie Bauer store opens doors

By Matt Kreps
Kansas State Collegian

Amidst brisk outdoor weather Thursday, Eddie Bauer opened indoors to brisk business.

The newest addition to Manhattan Town Center, Redmond, Wash.-based Eddie Bauer offers shoppers private-label clothing, accessories and home furnishings through its retail outlets, Internet catalog and print catalog.

"There were about 20 people when we opened the doors," said store manager Cathy Hill.

Customers had been waiting anxiously for the store to open for business since the initial announcement that the chain would come to Manhattan.

"We've been flipping through the catalogs, waiting for the store to open," said Shanon Lee, sophomore in mass communications, who was at the store with her mother, Nancy Lee.

The Manhattan store is one of more than 400 sportswear stores nationwide.

Unlike the Eddie Bauer HOME and AKA Eddie Bauer stores that offer home furnishings and contemporary dress clothing, respectively, the sportswear store focuses more on casual wear and travel gear.

Manhattan residents at the store said they were happy to have a local outlet for the popular brand.

Susan Mitchell and Betty Lundberg said they stopped in out of curiosity while they were mall walking.

"I love the Eddie Bauer store," Mitchell said.

"It's one of our favorite stores," Lundberg said.

Both said they planned to return for more shopping on a regular basis.

Other shoppers were happy to have a retail outlet in town so they would not have to depend on the catalog.

Randy Basaraba, assistant professor of diagnostic medicine and pathobiology, said he and his wife stopped in to browse while out to lunch with their son. He said his family regularly orders from the catalog and would enjoy being able to buy direct.

Shoppers also were impressed with the selection at the new store.

"I definitely like their clothes," K-State police officer and customer Don Stubbings said. "It gives you a better variety of selection in the mall."

Marc Harrington, district director for Eddie Bauer, said he was excited about the strong turnout for the store opening.

"We're excited and obviously the response has been terrific this morning. Word of mouth has been terrific," he said.

Harrington said strong catalog sales contributed to the decision to place a store in Manhattan.

"We have a strong catalog base here in Manhattan, and customers have been saying that we ought to be here," Harrington said.

He said the retail stores also help the company build its brand with customers. Since customers can try on clothing and examine the merchandise before buying, the customers have a better chance to become familiar with Eddie Bauer products.

"It allows us to expand the brand by us being here and being in front of the public eye where they can touch [the merchandise]," he said.

Master's program takes students to inner city

By Suzanne Wilson
Kansas State Collegian

A fourth-grade teacher starts his first day of instruction. When he turns his back on the class, a child in the front row picks up a dictionary and throws it at his head. What does the teacher do?

John Hortin, associate professor in the College of Education, is coordinating a master's program in the inner city of Kansas City, Kan., where he addresses such problems. Hortin said teachers shouldn't get angry at the child who threw the dictionary. Instead, he said, they need to find out what is wrong.

"It could be that the teacher said this is an English class and that child can't read in the fourth grade," Hortin said.

The K-State master's degree program offered in Kansas City has a multicultural/urban emphasis in elementary and secondary education. Students are required to take 36 hours to graduate. The classes are taught Monday evenings in an abandoned storefront in the inner city.

"Teachers said they were pleased we were willing to come to where they are," Hortin said. "It showed that we cared about them."

He said teachers have to be dedicated to work in the inner city, and that the job can be emotionally and intellectually taxing for teachers, who deal with bomb scares and students who bring guns to schools. Some teachers are even threatened or physically assaulted.

James Boyer, retired professor in the College of Education, said teachers take a mental-health class throughout the program. This class allows them to be more aware of the symptoms that indicate a student might have a possible mental disorder. He said this allows teachers to nurture the children in specific ways and refer them to a therapist if necessary.

Hortin said some courses require the teacher to look into other service agencies in the community, such as mental institutions and soup kitchens. Some teachers even ride around in a police car for the night.

Boyer said teachers learn about the frustrations and anxieties which their students experience.

"More culturally sensitive urban teachers can yield greater achievement among their students, and that's what the master's program wants to achieve," Boyer said.

Many of these children are starved for love, Hortin said.

"Sometimes the safest and happiest place for the child is during the school hours because the home environment is so bad," Hortin said.

He said teachers need to involve the students in providing a safe environment. Hortin said that giving the students ownership and responsibility in a safe environment will help them to believe in it, too.

Hortin said business people have told him the main reason why people get fired is that they can't get along with others. He said he believes that involving the students and teaching them how to tolerate, appreciate and respect others is important in education today.

"We teach respect to everybody. It's important to know other cultures and to be open-minded," Hortin said.

NO GAME. NO PROBLEM.

CLIF PALMBERG/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Is there life without K-State football? The Collegian editorial board says yes, and offers a top-10 list for ways to fill your weekend.

ABOVE:

Jason Kazar celebrates with others on the K-State kickoff team after recovering a fumble on the 24-yard line of Northeast Louisiana during a kickoff in the fourth quarter. Two plays later, Marlon Charles scored the last touchdown for the Wildcats.

Without football, life will go on at K-State

It might be hard to believe, and as much as some people hate to admit it, Manhattan can go on without K-State football. Life must go on.

So, in this non-football bye weekend, take time out and do some little things for yourself. Enjoy your weekend free from the commitments of school and football, and have fun. Here's your handy cheat sheet to surviving Manhattan without the comforts of Wildcat football.

The Top-10 Sports-Related Things to Do in Manhattan without a K-State Football Game:

10. Make your travel arrangements for the rest of the football season. The opportunity for road trips for the rest of the season is out there. True fans road trip; it's in their nature. If you are an optimistic fan, it might not be too early to start looking into making those reservations for St. Louis and the Big 12 Championship game or even Tempe, Ariz., and the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl, site of college football's national championship. But for that to happen, see No. 4.

9. With the weather continuing to get colder, the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex can help fill the void. It is still not too late in the year to begin that fitness program you swore you were going to start.

8. Speaking of the Rec Complex, take to the basketball court and start working on that jumpshot. Walk-on tryouts are not too far away, and the K-State basketball team could be looking for a little more scoring.

7. You could start camping out for next year's football tickets. You can be sure you will get them, and if you cross your fingers, you might be able to snag one of those prized ICAT memberships as well.

6. Manhattan is blessed with top-notch high school football teams all around it. Check out a game or two. Just don't wear your high school letter jacket. You don't want to be that person.

5. In case you haven't noticed, the major-league baseball playoffs are in full swing. You can find a game almost any time in the afternoon or evening. See if the Yankees can continue their run at history or if the Cubs and Sammy Sosa can keep their storybook seasons alive. There's sure to be drama across the board.

4. Root against the Nebraska Cornhuskers. The Huskers play Oklahoma State on Saturday in Kansas City, Mo. Go Cowboys.

3. Root against the Kansas Jayhawks. The Hawks play Texas A&M on Saturday. Go Aggies.

2. Aggieville, at least from a student perspective, is primarily a bar district. Even though it really has little to do with sports, bars just seem to make Manhattan a happier place, so use Aggieville accordingly. All of which brings us to the No. 1 thing to do in Manhattan without K-State football, and it can be summed up in one word:

1. Beer. Enough said.

Enjoy your bye week. Life will be back to normal next weekend. Or so we hope.

'THE SCARLET LETTER,' CLINTON MAKE PERFECT MATCH

JON KURCHE/COLLEGIAN

VIEWPOINT

MICHAEL NEFF

I'll get right down to facts.

I want President Clinton impeached. My roommate wants Clinton impeached. I polled four people on campus, and three of them wanted Clinton impeached. The other one wanted him assassinated.

I guess we are the minority, because according to Newsweek polls, it seems that the rest of the American public doesn't want Clinton removed from office. However, they do feel that some sort of alternate punishment is in order.

Congress is proposing various punishments, like a fine of $4.4 million, the cost of the Kenneth Starr investigation, or he could forfeit his $151,000 per year pension when he leaves the White House. Clinton could also be tried on perjury charges after he leaves office in 2002.

Bor-ing!

I honestly wonder if Congress has any sort of imagination at all. Trained monkeys can be more creative than that. Anyway, these punishments just aren't good enough for me. We need to look to our past to find some sort of adequate punishment.

Now, wouldn't life be grand if we were all Puritans like the ones in "The Scarlet Letter?" Now that would provide some interesting punishments. There would be no need for this lengthy, drawn-out Starr investigation that's costing us hard working taxpayers our hard earned money. No, no. Just slap a scarlet "A" on Clinton and Monica Lewinsky and throw them both in the stocks for a good dose of public humiliation and perhaps some good old-fashioned fruit and vegetable throwing. Those pineapples tend to leave a mark. Or maybe Clinton and Lewinsky already know this, and Starr just hasn't found out about it yet. No need for a trial, he confessed already; it's time to pay the piper.

Then again, to make it really interesting, Clinton could claim Monica Lewinsky was a witch and placed some seductive spell on him, so it wasn't his fault. Then we could do what I've wanted to do from the beginning — burn Monica at the stake. Whoo hoo! You get the hot dogs, I'll fetch the marshmallows.

Then again, Monica could also claim Bill was the witch and seduced her. What a bind we'd be in then. Not really. Burn them both! I haven't been to a raging bonfire party since high school. We could dance around the fire wearing those cool black hats with the belt buckle on it and celebrate the weeding-out of evil in our beloved nation.

Then again, perhaps the witch could be Al Gore, who cast a spell on both Lewinsky and Clinton to get Clinton impeached so he would become president. Hold on, it's all starting to make sense to me now. — Perhaps the witch is deeper in Congress. We could keep going down the line finding witches and uncover some huge scandal instituted by my old elementary school janitor so that eventually he could overthrow the government, become president and start up some totalitarian government. You know what, I think I saw this in an episode of "The X-Files" once.

Ah, those Puritans knew what they were doing. They had cool attire, the insolent in society were struck down by God and there were public executions. Those people sure knew how to party. So let's all buckle up our shoes, man the plows and live by the fire and brimstone teachings of Jonathan Edwards. Maybe that's all we need, a hearty helping of the fear of God.

Techno provides background music to columnists life

VIEWPOINT

TODD PACEY

If you have seen me walking around campus, chances are you might have heard some weird noises coming from my throat and not just the grumblings of having to get out of bed before noon.

"Unh-se, unh-se, unh-se,"

To understand how this sounds, check out Brodie in the elevator scene in "Mallrats." I don't make this noise to emulate Brodie. I wouldn't mind Rene, but I don't like comics.

Plus, the noise doesn't mean I've just had sex.

The noise is made because it is a beat in my head. No, don't beat me in the head. That hurts. Like most people sing their favorite songs of the moment to themselves, I make the noise because I listen to techno.

But you can do that noise to almost any upbeat song.

Last year, my roommate, after enduring two months of muffled techno blaring from my room, said, "I don't know how you can listen to that crap. It all sounds the same, and there's no words; it's just a bunch of noises."

Ladies and gentleman, my roommate Gavin R. Budhram, junior in pre-medicine.

In all fairness to Gavin, he's somewhat right. I hate country music because to me, it all sounds the same. I am sure there are many here who would tell me different. Not even a Southern Belle like Shania Twain could change my mind, unlike her power over my other roommate.

The man, the hair, Bradford Madison Kracht, junior in industrial engineering.

But, as Snoop says, "back to the lecture at hand." That is called sampling, and that is why I like techno music. It eerily reminds me of how I am living.

Obnoxious, hated and loud.

Like my life, techno music all mixes and intertwines somehow. To the casual observer, it would appear as if everything is the same, but to those close to me, close to the scene, there are many variations.

Metaphors are way too easy; it's time to be serious.

One of the greatest albums of the modern era is Pink Floyd's "Dark Side of the Moon." The reason is because it is truly an album. The songs are not even listed on the back, and they all intertwine. It is truly a groundbreaking record.

And I don't even like Pink Floyd.

But that does help to explain why I like techno music. The music scene has been flooded with bands who are better than one-hit wonders but still not good. They might have a few good songs but not a whole album's worth.

Hardly anyone makes albums anymore; society is too easily amused.

Techno music, however, offers the listener a whole album. You don't need to know the name of the tracks, because they all mix together. A good album does not let you know when the song ends and begins.

You like that sound? Good, 'cause it's going to last for 70 minutes.

I know my mother would agree with me. Dad listens to Floyd, so he's already on my side. She listens to a man named Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, or, more generally, classical music. You gotta love a man with the first name of Wolfgang. Ever since Tom Hulce's portrayal, I've liked Mozart.

Classical music has survived because there are no words. Opera has survived because no one can understand it. Music does not have to have words to be good. It just has to sound good to you.

Another of my roommate's complaints was that the noises were all made by computers. The noises are just to synthesize noises. The spectrum of audible sounds to humans is so small compared to the whole, why not utilize as many as you can?

Every time I listen to a techno album I hear things I hadn't heard before.

Techno music has received a bad rap mainly due to club music, which does sound the same. That is done so people can dance to it. However, there is much more techno out there, which I have found thanks to my mentor, DJ MI5 of KSDB-FM 91.9; drum and bass, ambient, jungle, trance and digital hardcore.

An alarming number of TV commercials are starting to use all kinds of techno in the background. Many bands have added a DJ to their line-up, while others are starting to make the songs on their albums intertwine.

These are just the ramblings of someone tired of the crappy bands flooding our airwaves.

Time well spent in sorority house eliminates stereotypes

VIEWPOINT

JACOB PALENSKE

I admit it.

I made stereotypes about people I didn't know. I judged a group of people by the actions of one.

I used to be a greek basher.

I made jokes about sorority women. I called them stupid, stuck-up and snobby. I also laughed at other's jokes about them. As far as I was concerned, if a female was a member of a greek organization, chances were good they would embody at least a few of these qualities.

Last week, I was given a big wake-up call.

I have been spending quite a bit of time in local greek houses because of my job with the Royal Purple yearbook. We staffers each have to spend a few hours per week taking portrait pictures at each house, and my turn came around Wednesday.

In the past, my experiences at these houses have been mixed. Most of the women were fairly nice, but there were always those few exceptions that further fueled my stereotypes.

Then I spent an afternoon at the Kappa Alpha Theta house, an afternoon that changed the way I viewed the greek system.

I have never felt so welcome in a greek house in my life.

From the minute I walked in the front door, I could tell that this place was a little different from the other houses I had been to. Everyone spoke to me.

They were all friendly, and nobody complained about having their pictures taken.

No matter how long the line became, everyone waited patiently and without complaint. Many of the members asked about the yearbook and my role in its publication. They also spoke to the photographer in this friendly manner.

My designated time to help with pictures was from 5:30-7 p.m. This made it almost impossible for me to get anything for dinner before I went to the Theta house. I mentioned this to the photographer and said I would have to order pizza or something.

One of the members overheard our conversation, promptly said the house was just about to eat dinner and that we were more than welcome to join them.

I was amazed.

The photographer and I declined the invitation because we were almost done with pictures, but the photographer said she was a little thirsty.

The next thing I know, one of the members walked in with a glass of water for her.

When I left that house, I actually felt bad about all the jokes I had ever made about sorority members. It turns out that they aren't all stupid. They definitely weren't stuck-up and snobby and the members of this particular house were extremely friendly.

So, as much as this hurts, I will admit it.

I was wrong.

The members of the Theta house should be commended for their hospitality.

They changed my view of the greek system and gave all sorority women a better image in my mind.

Congress sends Clinton $270.5 billion defense bill

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A compromise $270.5 billion defense budget that both the Pentagon and congressional leaders consider bare-bones won final Senate approval on Thursday by a wide margin.

The measure would raise military pay by 3.6 percent, support Clinton's decision to keep U.S. troops in Bosnia, impose new curbs on satellite exports and allow the Army, Navy and Air Force to continue to train men and women recruits together. The Marine Corps could continue its same-gender training.

The White House has objected to a provision transferring satellite export licensing from the Commerce Department — where Clinton lodged it in 1996 — back to the State Department.

But Democratic congressional aides said they expected President Clinton to sign the bill anyway.

The vote was 96-2, with Sens. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., and Paul Wellstone, D-Minn., voting nay.

Defense-oriented lawmakers decried the size of the defense measure, whose $270.5 billion level was dictated by last year's balanced budget law and, adjusted for inflation, represents the 14th-consecutive annual decline in defense spending.

"Pay is too low, the benefits are in question and we are losing good people," Sen. Dan Coats, R-Ind., told the Senate.

The bill's 3.6-percent military pay raise is half a percentage point more than requested by the president. The measure also increases enlistment bonuses in the Army to $6,000 from the present $4,000.

With sentiment increasing on Capitol Hill to spend a chunk of the nation's new budget surplus on more defense spending, lawmakers were eagerly awaiting Clinton's submission of a measure expected to give the Pentagon an immediate supplement of $1 billion to $4 billion.

Still, the Pentagon estimates that closing the gap between military and civilian pay could cost as much as $45 billion over the next five years.

Final action on the defense budget comes amid acrimonious debate between congressional leaders and the military over the readiness and morale of the nation's troops — and who's to blame.

Members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff were criticized earlier this week by senators who claimed the top military brass hadn't warned them about the problems in time to adjust the Pentagon budget.

The Pentagon complains Congress keeps forcing on it planes and ships it doesn't need while insisting on keeping open antiquated bases that should be closed to save costs.

The bill authorizes $1.9 billion that Clinton requested for keeping U.S. troops in Bosnia in the fiscal year that began Thursday.

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL PLAYOFF ROUNDUP

Chicago blows 9th-inning lead; Atlanta takes 2-0 series lead

ATLANTA — It was a magical regular season for the Chicago Cubs. The postseason is the same old thing.

Two outs from evening their first-round playoffs series, the Cubs lost a ninth-inning lead on Javy Lopez's homer, squandered a great scoring chance in the 10th, then had a defensive mixup in the bottom half and lost to the Atlanta Braves 2-1 on Chipper Jones' single Thursday night.

The Braves have a 2-0 lead in the best-of-5 series, which moves to Wrigley Field for Game 3 on Saturday night.

The Cubs, seeking their first World Series title since 1908, turned sloppy after Kevin Tapani's brilliant performance. He took a four-hit shutout into the ninth before giving up Lopez's homer into the left-field stands.

In the top of the 10th, Glenallen Hill led off with a walk, was bunted to second by Gary Gaetti and stole third after an intentional walk to Mickey Morandini.

But former Atlanta shortstop Jeff Blauser struck out against rookie Odalis Perez, and Lopez threw out Morandani, who was trying to steal second on the 3-2 pitch.

In the bottom of the inning, the Braves struck quickly against loser Terry Mulholland, who took over for Tapani. Walt Weiss walked with one out and Tony Graffanino bunted down the first-base line to four-time Gold Glove Mark Grace.

Grace was late making the throw to Mulholland covering the bag, and the pitcher missed the bag for an error. Jones followed with a line drive just inside the left-field line while Weiss trotted home with the winning run.

Chicago scored only two runs in two games at Turner Field, but nearly left Atlanta with the series tied because of Tapani's unlikely performance. He gave up five hits and struck out six in nine innings.

Perez got the win in the first postseason appearance of his career.

Though he was Chicago's top winner (19-9) during the season, Tapani had a 4.79 ERA and was roughed up badly in his previous two starts, giving up 17 hits and 10 earned runs in 10 2-3 innings.

The Cubs usually try to pound teams into submission with Sammy Sosa and the rest of the offense having scored 831 runs to rank third in the league. But Chicago was routed 7-1 in the first game and managed only four hits Wednesday against Tom Glavine and four relievers.

Astros rebound to win Game 2; series heads back to San Diego

HOUSTON — The Houston Astros showed they are more than just the Killer B's.

Yes, the trio of Jeff Bagwell, Craig Biggio and Derek Bill finally had playoff performances living up to the nickname. Bill Spiers and Ricky Gutierrez had some effect, too, and that's why the Astros are headed to San Diego with a split in their NL division series.

After Houston blew the lead in the ninth inning, Spiers' RBI single with one out lifted the Astros to a wild 5-4 win over the Padres on Thursday, tying the series 1-all.

"The team is a lot more than the B's," manager Larry Dierker said. "We have to have other last names do something, too, like Billy Spiers."

The Astros took a 4-2 lead into the ninth thanks to the B's, but Billy Wagner allowed a two-out, two-run homer to pinch-hitter Jim Leyritz.

Opening the ninth off loser Dan Miceli, Gutierrez beat out an infield single to shortstop. Brad Ausmus sacrificed, Trevor Hoffman relieved and Gutierrez stunned the Padres by stealing third base uncontested.

"I knew with Hoffman's big leg kick it would be tough to throw me out," said Gutierrez, one of 12 players involved in the big trade between the clubs in December 1994. "So I took off. I guess they didn't think I would steal."

He was right.

"Ricky, I think, surprised everyone," Tony Gwynn said. "It was a great move by him but it put us in a tough situation."

Hoffman said he should have kept Gutierrez on second. "In that situation, giving him, third base was a big mistake," said Hoffman, a leading candidate for the NL Cy Young Award.

Hoffman threw four of his bedeviling changeups to Spiers, who singled to right on a 1-2 count.

"It was a pretty good pitch, I felt like, after seeing the replay," Spiers said. "I was pretty lucky to get enough of the bat on it. My approach didn't look too good the first two swings."

Spiers went 3-for-5 with two doubles and scored once.

Women golfers get 1st glimpse of conference foes

By JOSHUA KINDER
Kansas State Collegian

The women's golf team is getting its first look at the rest of the Big 12 Conference, starting today in the Big 12 Preview in Austin, Texas.

Jane Yi has remained one of the most consistent golfers this season. Yi tied for 17th in the Heather Farr Memorial on Sept. 20-22, posting 77-80-73-230 to help lead the team to a 10th-place overall finish in a field of 14 teams. Lindsay Hammerschmidt tied for 29th shooting 78-76-81-235.

"I've been practicing a lot on my short game," Yi said. "A person may be able to hit in the fairway every time, but if you can't get to the green you'll have trouble."

Coach Kristy Knight said she was pleased with the outcome of the game.

"It was a pretty good finish," she said. "We did a good job salvaging rounds. It could have been worse. We didn't have to count a score over 81 in the whole tournament. That's what I'm pleased about this year. Jane and Lindsay had a good tournament."

Now the team focuses on the Big 12 Preview. This will be the first time it sees all the conference opponents.

"It really is just another tournament," Knight said. "The Big 12 is such a competitive conference. The girls know they will be playing with some of the best players in the country. If we don't play well, we'll just move on the next event.

"It's always a fun tournament. Good things always happen when the Big 12 teams get together."

Yi said she agreed that the tournament is a great opportunity for the team.

"It's the one chance in the fall season to see the Big 12," she said. "It may not be the Big 12 Championship that we play in in the spring, but it's like it."

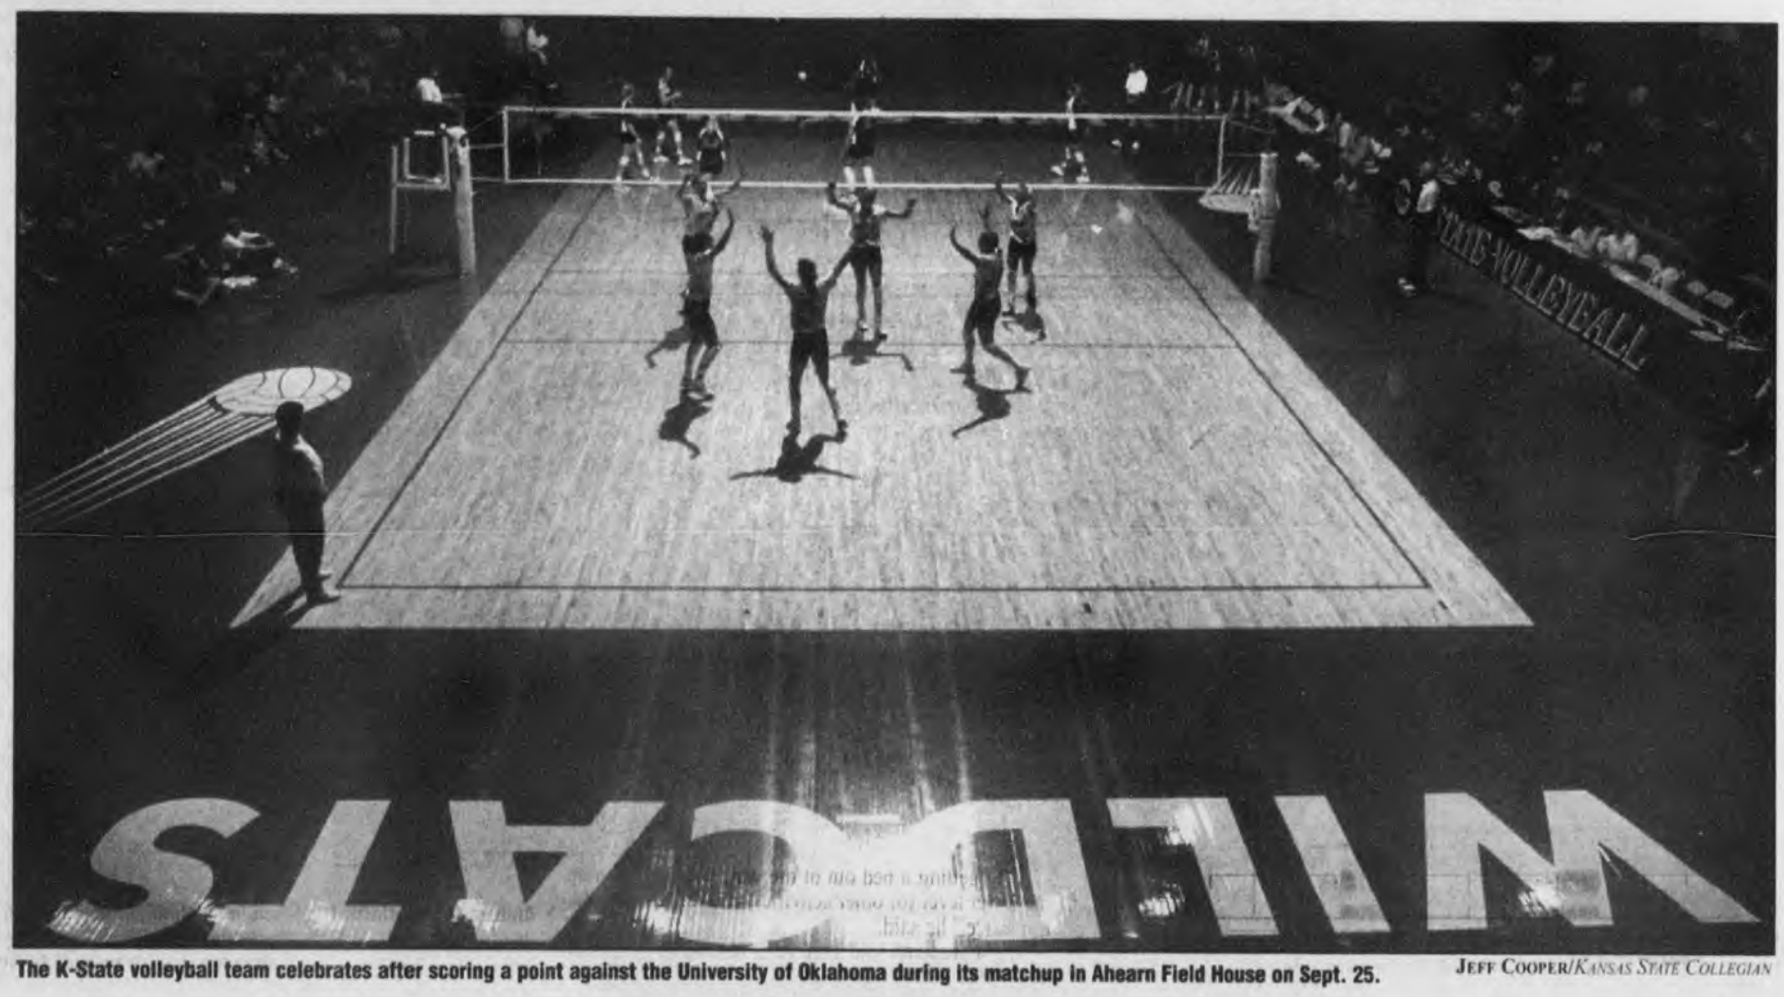
Mitzi Taylor will go into the tournament as the No. 1 golfer, followed by Carrie Chambers and Yi. Traci Benninga and Kelli Johnston round out the five who are competing. They finished qualifying for the tournament on Monday.

In the final round of qualifying, Johnston leapfrogged three positions to make it onto the traveling squad. It will be her first time to compete with the team.

"She was on the outside looking in going into the final round. She shot a good final round and passed three people to get in there," Knight said. "She seemed a little surprised. She didn't shoot a great score, but it was a decent score.

"It was good enough to get in there. I really think she will gain confidence out of that."

Johnston competed as an individual in the first tournament of the season and struggled. She said she felt she had improved since then and had the confidence she'll need to post a good score.



"I felt really relaxed in the final round," Johnston said. "When I started I didn't feel like I was going to qualify, but I started to realize that I had a shot. I just started chipping well and made my putts."

Yi said the team's goal remains the same and that they just want to continue to improve at each tournament.

"We feel like we're improving," Yi said. "But a lot of the other schools have been improving as well. We've had good scores, but we need to push more to get better. We need to get a step ahead."

Yi said she felt this was a realistic goal.

"I believe we can do it. We have those who are experienced and those who aren't," she said. "The experienced can tell them it's okay and help them deal with the pressure. The players we have are getting stronger in every tournament," Yi said.

TEXAS 2 STEP

Cats hit road to face Longhorns, Aggies

By BRENT STOVER
Kansas State Collegian

The Wildcat volleyball team has made it into the top 25.

Now the team gets the chance to prove it belongs there.

That chance will come this weekend as K-State travels to Texas to take on 17th-ranked Texas A&M tonight and 13th-ranked Texas on Saturday night.

"I think we deserve to be in the top 25," Wildcat coach Jim McLaughlin said. "And now we need to stay there by just winning and getting better."

This weekend's opponents squared off against each other Wednesday night, with Texas getting the victory in five games over A&M.

However, the Aggies held their own and played the Longhorns to within four points in the final game.

"Just on paper, Texas is more physical and more mature," McLaughlin said. "I thought Texas would have handled it a little bit easier, but it just shows that Texas A&M is pretty good."

The Aggies enter tonight's match with a 9-2 record, including a 2-1 conference mark.

A&M had won seven matches in a row before falling to Texas.

The Aggies are led by Stacy Sykora, who averages more than five kills per game and has 185 for the season so far. Sykora also digs nearly five balls per game.

Texas also is 9-2 overall and 3-0 in conference play.

The Longhorns have one of the top players in the nation in Demetria Sance. Sance had 25 kills and 25 digs in the match against A&M.

"Demetria Sance is the best player in the whole country," McLaughlin said. "She's the complete package. She's just very, very powerful and strong."

McLaughlin said attempting to stop Sance will be the key to the Texas match.

"I don't think you ever totally stop a person like that," he said.

"We're going to have to make her do some things that she's uncomfortable doing."

Tonight's match against the Aggies starts at 7. Saturday night's contest in Austin will begin at 7:30.

ABC's indecision on Colorado football game telecast leaving K-State fans high, dry

VIEWPOINT

John BERGGREN

If you're talking about dictators of the world, there are the Adolf Hitlers and the Fidel Castros, but one more you might consider adding to that list is the American Broadcasting Corporation.

ABC gets first choice to decide if it wants to cover next week's K-State game at Colorado, but it has other options and is dragging its feet on whether it wants to air the game or give it away to one of its competitors.

K-State and Colorado fans will have to wait until sometime Sunday, after this weekend's games are played out, to find out what time kickoff will be for the biggest game for both schools so far this season.

For the several thousand K-State fans planning on making the trip to Boulder, Colo., this is nothing but an inconvenience. It's an inconvenience that is being dictated by one television network: ABC.

Kickoff could be anywhere from 2:30 p.m. to 6 p.m. next Saturday, depending on who picks the game up. If ABC makes the blunder of not carrying the game, either FOX or fX will put the Wildcats on the air. Most people don't care who televises the game, as long as Manhattan's cable system carries the station.

ABC's other option is the Nebraska game at Texas A&M. No matter how you shake it down, that game will never have as much on the line as the K-State vs. Colorado match-up.

The bad blood between K-State and Colorado is just as intense as what has been spilled between Kansas and Missouri over the years. Colorado wants to beat the Wildcats more than ever after getting whipped 37-20 in KSU Stadium last year. K-State, on the other hand, would love to shut up CU coach Rick Neuheisel for good, winning at Folsom Field for the first time under coach Bill Snyder.

It's amazing that television has so much power over college athletics. Television can make a 3-1/2 hour game into a five-hour torture. It also can leave the plans of fans and players hanging in the balance.

Television is probably the best recruiting tool there is for any college program in the country. The exposure that K-State has received over the past three years surely has had a hand in allowing the Wildcats to get a seemingly first choice at the high school recruits in Texas and Oklahoma, but isn't fan support just as important to a program as recruiting?

Snyder said he realizes the hardships television can place on football supporters.

"From our standpoint, and for college athletics, it does bother me that television has so much control," Snyder said. "People look at it as, 'Wow, you're going to get all this money for playing on TV,' but we may have to spend twice as much to accommodate for transportation.

"I don't think it needs to be the way it is. It's a tremendous issue for fans. If you live in western Kansas, it may not be quite the issue. But if you live here in eastern Kansas, the travel is a big factor. Even if you're traveling some way other than an automobile, the timing is very critical. Fans can't afford just to pack up and fly."

Not knowing the game time also can affect the players' routine on game day.

"It's not a big deal as long as you can plan your own agenda, which we can do as long as we can find out when we play," Snyder said. "We have many activities we can plan to get us ready on the day of the game but the airlines aren't going to wait for you. It's just business as usual for them.

You only get so many windows to make your decisions or otherwise it gets scheduled someplace else."

DORM DECOR

Students strive to make rooms more like home

BY SARAH FLORIE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The first glimpse of white cement walls and cold, uncarpeted floors of a residence hall room can add to a student's homesickness. Many students, however, have found ways to make their rooms look and feel more like home.

Spatial issues are often the most frustrating for students living in the residence halls. They might have a tough time cramming all of their belongings, such as a television, VCR, stereo, microwave, refrigerator, and computer into such a small place.

Students said figuring out where to put the beds is the most trying issue.

Many students said they thought it would save a great deal of space if the beds could be bunked.

"I wish our beds were bunkable like they are in the KU residence halls," Brent Maidment, freshman in human ecology, said.

Several Moore Hall residents said lofts were the best space-savers for their residence hall room bed dilemmas.

"We had to get lofts because we didn't have room for everything we had," Julie Fahey, freshman in open option, said.

Students who have lofts are able to save space by elevating their beds, making more room for such things as desks and televisions, which can go underneath the loft.

"Lofts built in the residence halls can't be any bigger than 4 feet by 8 feet and can't be higher than 70 inches," said Regina Tirella, Moore Hall assistant coordinator.

Ludwig Villasi, assistant professor of clothing, textiles and interior design, said that by having a loft, the students make the best use of their space.

"By getting a bed out of the way, you can open up the lower level for other activities, creating a multiple-use space," he said.

Most students said they paid between $55-60 for their lofts.

Another thing many students considered a necessity was carpet. Students obtained their carpet in various ways from getting old scraps from their parents and buying rugs at Wal-Mart to utilizing carpet sales outside the residence halls.

Some students said they felt carpet is a great way to make their rooms feel more like home.

"Carpet is a necessity to making your room feel warmer," Stephanie Monroe, freshman in biology, said.

Villasi said carpet and rugs also serve visual functions.

"It is essential to have a rug," Villasi said. "Rugs separate space and also create inexpensive luxury."

Students also have done a variety of things to make their rooms personal comfort zones. Students are allowed to bring pets such as rabbits, hedgehogs, gerbils, tarantulas, lizards and fish.

"Basically, pets in the residence halls just have to be contained in a cage or aquarium," Tirella said.

Many residence hall residents agreed poster and wall art definitely help their rooms embody their own personal styles while adding color to the washed-out walls. Students hang all sorts of things from blankets and banners to road signs and beer lights on their walls.

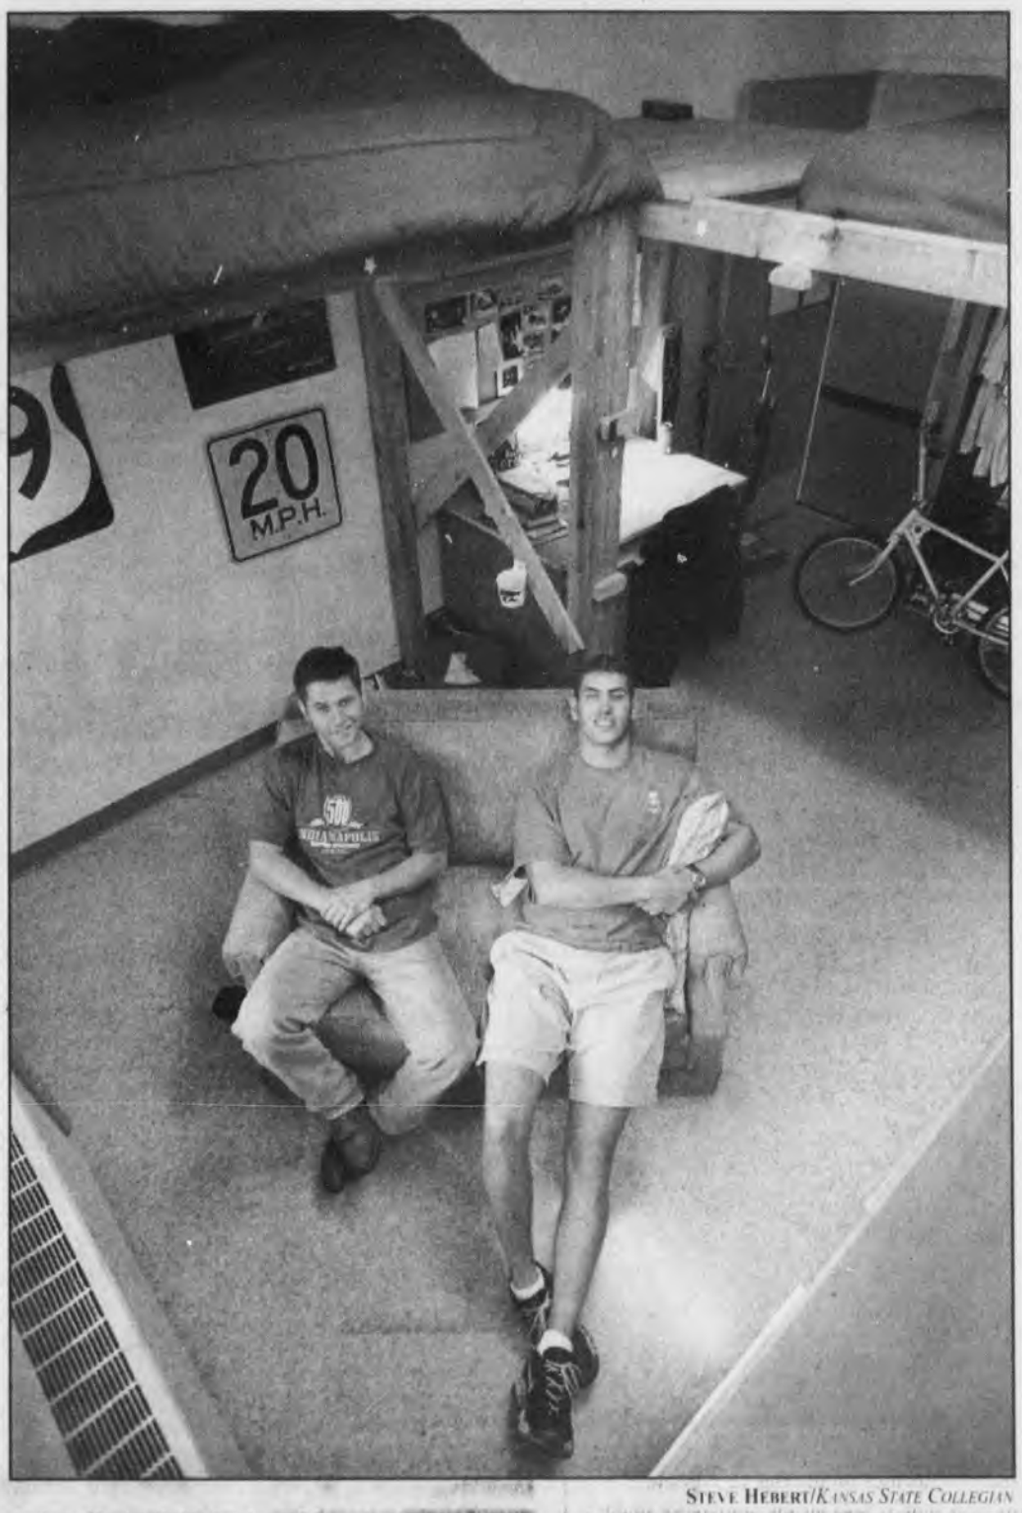
"There are even some wonderful fabrics out there that are inexpensive," Villasi said. "Students can do a variety of things with them, from making their own curtains to creating a scenic backdrop."

Villasi also said having a window treatment, such as curtains, can make the room feel more like a home by helping to separate the living area from the sleeping area, appearing to open up the space.

Many students have said the most economical place to shop for room accessories in Manhattan is Wal-Mart. They also agree the K-State Student Union's fall poster sale is the best place to get wall coverings.

Several students found that just by changing the lighting in their rooms, they were able to make the space feel more like home.

"The regular lighting in our room wasn't very exciting, so we went and bought black lights and replaced all of the regular bulbs in the room with them," said Andrew Moreau, freshman in mechanical engineering.



Candles are also popular lighting for dorm rooms.

"The only regulation is that they are attended to," Tirella said.

Without a doubt, though, the best way students have found to make their dorm rooms feel comfortable is by displaying pictures of family and friends.

"Pictures of family and friends are most important in my room," Monroe said.

By having these pictures around, students said they felt, even though they might be away from home, they are still surrounded by their loved ones.

STEVE HEBERT/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Andrew Moreau(left), freshman in mechanical engineering, and Phil Verhaeghe, freshman in business, have done some minor adjustments to their Moore Hall dorm room to make it more like home. To make a little more space for themselves, sleeping lofts were built to free up more ground space. Moreau said recycled wood kept the price down and a nail gun and a few screws put everything together.

3 bands to play all-ages show on Saturday

BY JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Underage students no longer have to flirt with bouncers or sneak in back entrances to see their favorite local bands live.

Manhattan favorites Ultimate Fakebook, Sufferbus and Podstar will play for all ages on Saturday at the Manhattan Arts Center. The show is something of a landmark for these bands — not only is it the first time the three have played together, but it also will be the first all-ages show Fakebook and Sufferbus have played since their appearance at Bombers, the Aggieville bar that burned down in February.

"Younger people are constantly asking us to play where they can see us," said Eric Melin, drummer for Ultimate Fakebook.

In fact, underage fans would wait outside bars and clubs and beg band members for help in getting past bouncers.

"The bars are really cracking down on underage kids," Melin said.

Sometimes, the problem isn't an underage fan base — it's when the band members are underage. Members of Podstar said their average age is somewhere around 17, but their talent has allowed them access to places, such as Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon, that would normally bar their entry.

"We've played at Streetside Records, or any other place that lets underagers in," band member Cameron Hawk said. "We play whenever we get the opportunity."

Hawk, who has appeared in productions at the arts center since he was six, got the original idea of playing there from Ruskabank vocalist Dave Spiker.

"It's a good place for a live show," Hawk said.

After being featured on last year's "Manhattan Project" compact disc, a compilation of local artists, Podstar decided to enter a recording studio to begin work on a debut CD.

Hawk said the release date "will not be anytime soon," since recording is still in the early phases.

Ultimate Fakebook also is back in recording studios, working on a sophomore album that could be out as early as February.

The Saturday show begins at 8 p.m. Tickets are $5 and can be purchased at the door an hour before show time.

NC-17 movie comes to Union

BY AMY MILLER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

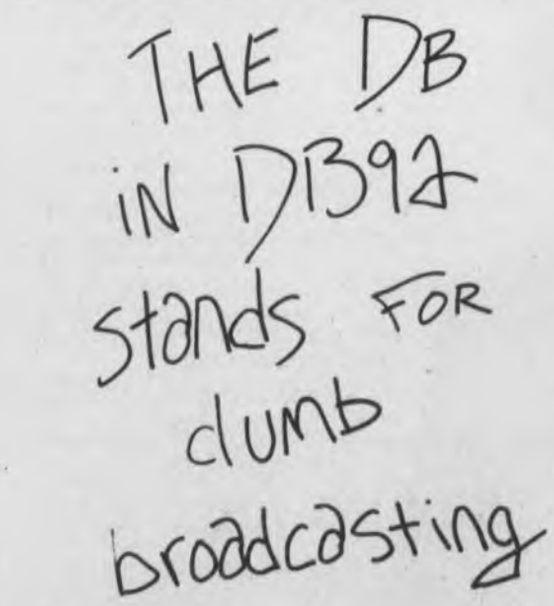
"The Cook, the Thief, His Wife & Her Lover," presented by Union Program Council tonight and Saturday night may not be for everyone.

The 1989, NC-17-rated movie was written and directed by British filmmaker Peter Greenaway. Noted for costumes by Jean Paul Gaultier and lighting that changes hues, it centers around gangster Albert Spica and his wife, Georgina, whose marital problems culminate in murder and cannibalism.

Chris Heeley, chairman for UPC's Kaleidosope Committee and junior in interior architecture, said the committee has brought adult films to K-State before, such as last year's showing of "Romper Stomper," which had an NC-17 rating for violence and nudity.

"We don't show all Disney movies," Heeley said. "We've brought NC-17 movies before. Our goal as a committee is to bring diversity to campus."

SHOW INFO
"The Cook, the Thief, His Wife & Her Lover" will be shown at 7 and 9:30 p.m. today and Saturday.



Hal Hinson of The Washington Post said in his review of the movie that its central character was a metaphor for society's rampant consumerism, and the movie was "a work full of puke and rot and fornication."

Tony Tovell, graduate student in fine arts, said he was somewhat intrigued by the movie.

"My overall feeling was 'Wow, that was kind of gross,' but it was also compelling," Tovell said. "It's grotesque and weird, but it has funny parts in it."

on the first floor, civil engineering offices and labs on the second floor and civil labs in the basement. The interior features a two-story lobby outside the auditorium and a balcony on the second floor that looks through the two-story space to Rathbone Hall's atrium.

Bids for construction will come in this semester and the college plans for occupancy during the summer of 2000.

Civil engineering's new home

Stuart Swartz, head of the civil engineering department, has been at K-State for 30 years and considers his department's move to Fiedler as an important development in its history.

"I think the library complex is a major step for all of us," Swartz said.

Instead of the rambling connection of spaces that form the department's Seaton Hall home, the move to Fiedler will give civil engineering some adjoining spaces — offices across the hall from labs and more teaching classrooms in labs. Fiedler will be wired into the university network to allow for the integration of computers in the classroom more readily.

"Some of our experiments are aided by computers now, and we hope to get more of that equipment for the new building," Swartz said. "We want to make more use of the electronic media available to us and this facility will allow that."

Swartz played an integral role on the building committee for Fiedler as the connection between his department and the architects over the past year. He appointed representatives from the department's various technical areas to represent their space needs to the architect.

There have been no plans made for filling civil engineering's vacated space in Seaton. The departments of Biological and Agricultural Engineering and Architectural Engineering and Construction Science will remain in Seaton.

Rathbone said those departments deserved credit for recognizing they had good facilities in Seaton and that Fiedler couldn't accommodate everyone.

While there's no question Fiedler will be built, there is a $2-million fund-raising effort underway to fund equipment and furniture acquisitions. The campaign is chaired by alumni John Bailey and Bill Stannard.

Campaign organizers are optimistic, for the Fiedler project has been built from the start on the benevolence of others.

"It's my guess that Mrs. Fiedler has given more money to this university than any other single person," Rathbone said. "If she hasn't, she's right up there with the top three. She's been a very gracious and generous supporter of engineering at K-State."

MODERNIZE

most recent suite additions being in Boyd Hall. West, Haymaker, Goodnow and Marlatt halls also have had suites added or renovated.

Facilities 2000 not only includes renovating and modernizing students' living environments but also includes simple maintenance of the residence hall rooms.

The painting of all student rooms and apartments, an upgrade in fire and health safety, and expanding technological and information systems in the halls are just a few of the ongoing projects funded by the program.

The Derby Academic Resource Center, located in Derby Dining Center, is another part of the renovations program.

The budget increase would be in effect through June 30, 2002.

The legislation also includes funding for two other SGA initiatives.

An allocation of $18,000 to provide for auditing services from the K-State Internal Audit Office and $14,810 to fund necessary components of the Course Information Program were included. The CIP components include a graduate assistant, student workers, data collection and publication and office needs.

In other business, SGA moved one step closer to a possible K-State Saferide program with new legislation to create a special committee to research campus interest and programs at other schools.

Three strong musical personalities join forces for a performance that will surprise and delight. Their concert features a winning mix of Bach, bluegrass, jazz, world music, with a little R&B on the side...
Fleck is an avant-country banjo player, perhaps best known for his work with the Flecktones. Marshall plays a variety of instruments from the mandolin family and has performed with the David Grisman Quintet, Stephane Grappelli and Mark O'Connor. Bassist Meyer is a composer who's at home playing bluegrass and recording country music in Nashville as well as serving as the regular bassist for the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center.
"The three together were, quite possibly the sharpest and at the same time the most relaxed ensemble I've ever seen, distinguished first by pinpoint rhythm, next by endless shades of time and touch, and finally by sheer enjoyment."

Bed and breakfasts fighting zoning regulations

Zoning restrictions say establishments can only legally serve breakfast

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

While owners and zoning board members both say they're glad to have bed and breakfasts in Manhattan, opinions differ on whether they should be allowed to provide more than lodging for the night and eggs in the morning.

In recent months, the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board has discussed the idea of changing regulations at the urging of owners.

The process has been mostly a search for middle ground, board member Brad Fenwick said.

"I don't think that there's any question that they're an asset to the community, but how to help them serve the community better is the question," Fenwick said.

In 1996, when the city created a special zoning category for bed and breakfasts to operate in residential areas, several restrictions came along with it. Local bed and breakfasts legally can't serve meals other than breakfast to guests or any meals to non-guests.

Michael Cody, owner and operator of the Colt House Inn Bed & Breakfast, said she has invested more than $300,000 in the house and needs revenue from teas and luncheons to help cover the house payments.

Cody said she already has had small events for non-guests, despite the regulations.

"There's no other way I can pay for that renovation and that kitchen just serving breakfasts," she said. "There's no other way I know of to do this, unless you're a millionaire."

The kitchen Cody referred to is a commercial-grade kitchen including a fire control system and fume hood that regulations require for bed and breakfasts with four or more guest rooms. The Colt House Inn has five.

The Colt House Inn, built in 1906, was a collection of apartments constantly visited by the police, Cody said. Now the same house doesn't cost taxpayers a dime and pays several thousand dollars in taxes every year, she said.

The Fairchild Inn, the only other bed and breakfast in town required to maintain a commercial kitchen, also wants to change regulations to allow functions with food, co-owner Kevin Peirce said.

In addition, other regulations make selling the business or running it from a distance nearly impossible, he said.

Since the property can be sold only as a house and not a business, new owners would have to re-establish zoning requirements to continue the same business they bought, he said.

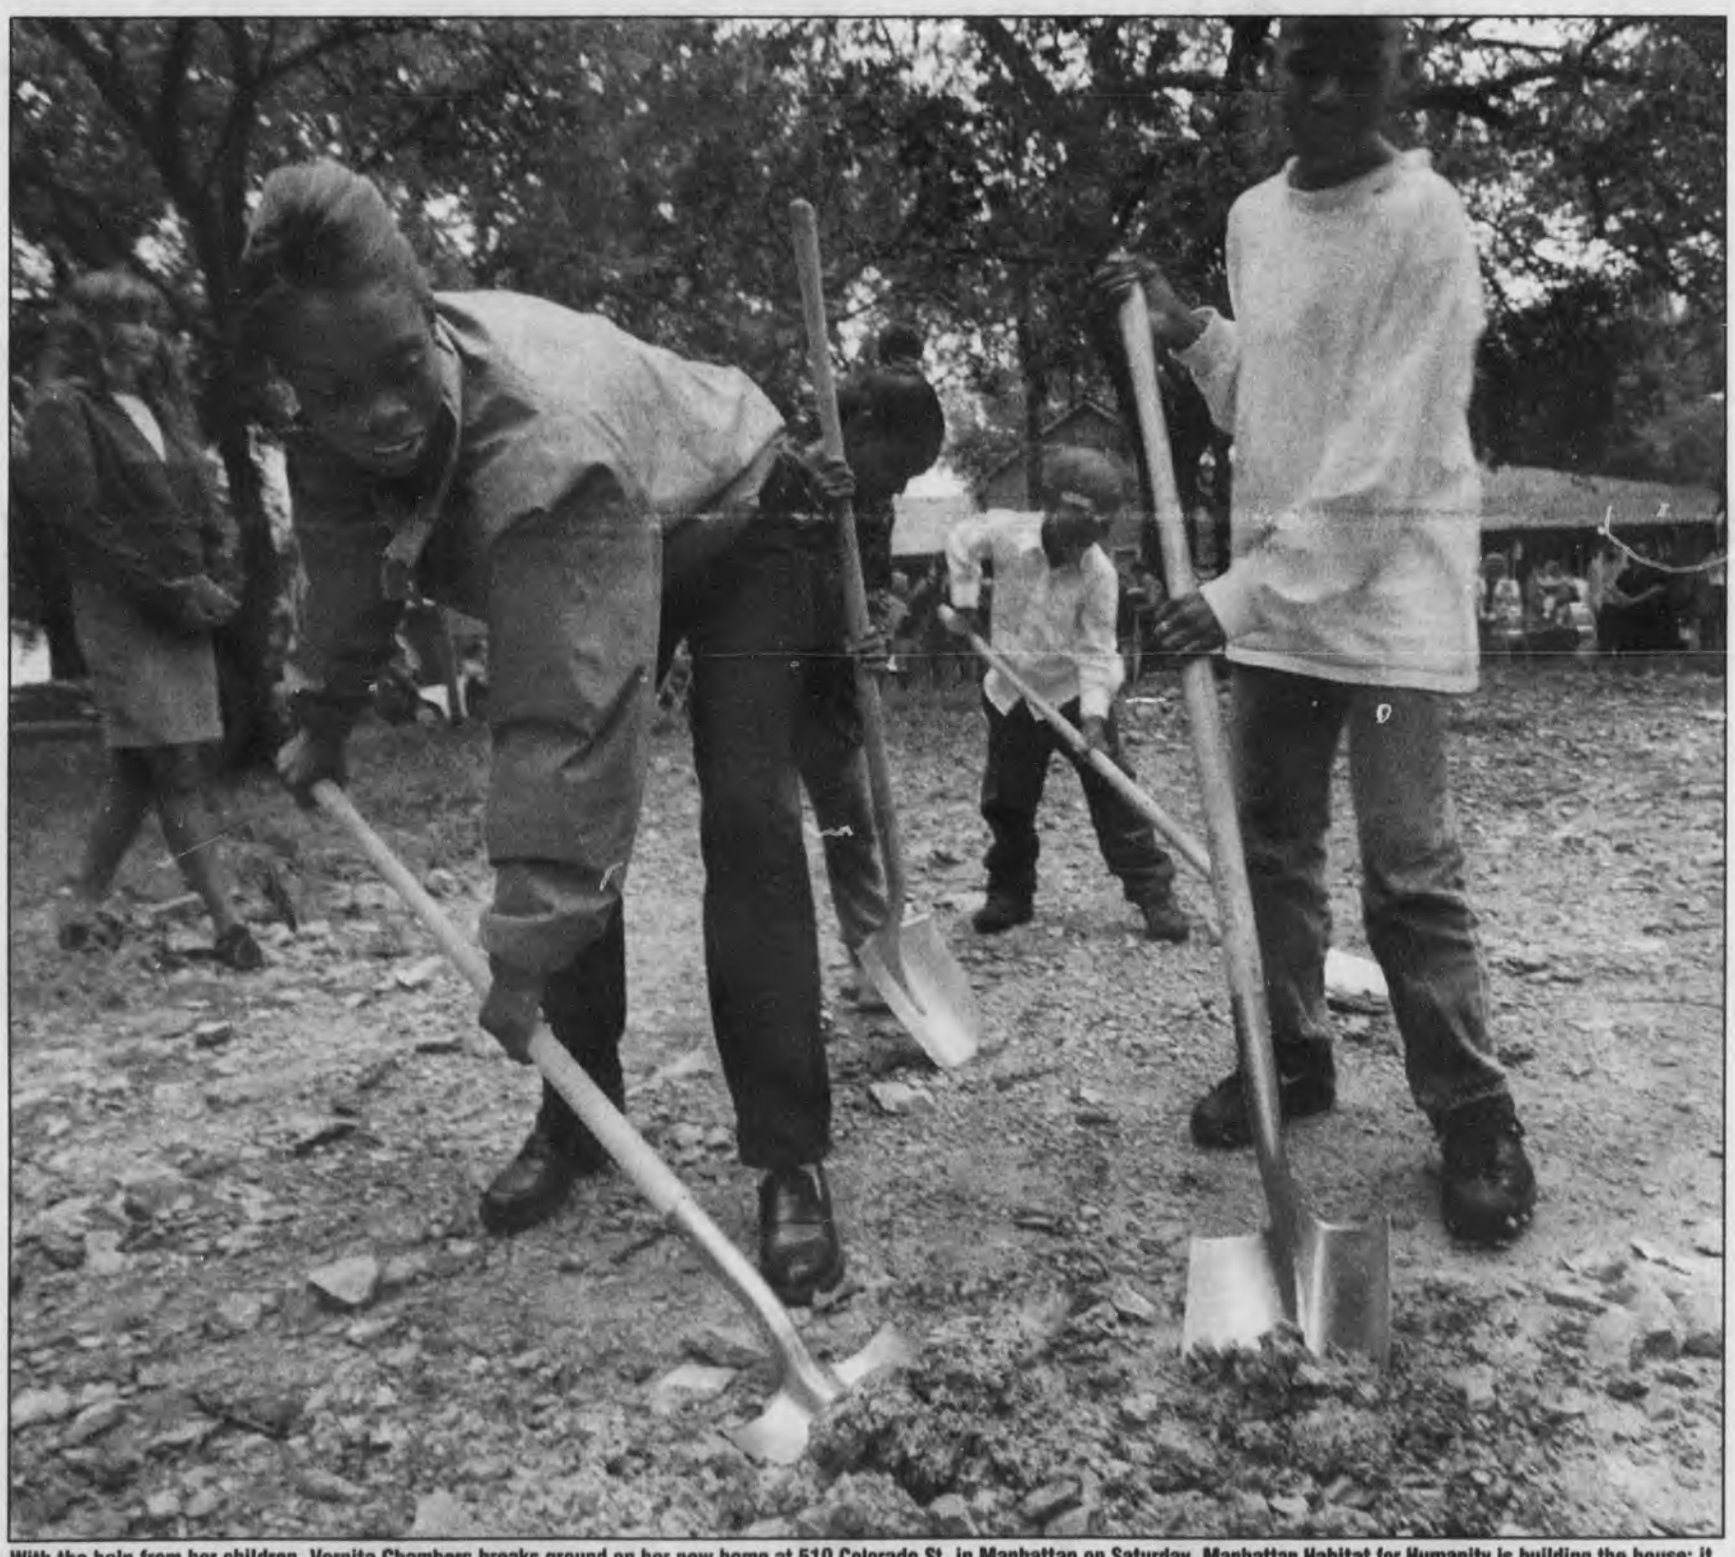
In addition, regulations stipulate owners must be present at all times the bed and breakfast is in operation, as opposed to a qualified manager, he said.

Peirce said that after running the inn for more than a year, he wanted to expand his rights to equal those of other businesses.

"When we first started out, we were new and people piled on lots of restrictions," he said. "We, as a group, knew that if we fought too hard, we might not be able to do it at all."

■ OUR OPINION
The Collegian editorial board says bed and breakfasts deserve the resources needed to flourish.
See Page 4.

Zoning board member Ray Weisenburger said the innkeepers serve visitors for local events and restore houses unlikely to be bought as homes.



Weisenburger said the board had discussed the possibility of creating two divisions in the bed and breakfast category: "bed and breakfast houses," bound by the current regulations, and "bed and breakfast inns" that could qualify to have functions and serve food.

Laurie Pieper, co-owner of The Morning Star Bed & Breakfast and assistant professor in philosophy, said the board shouldn't forget smaller establishments, if they do change regulations.

"We've been happy with the way the ordinance has been written, but if others get more rights, we'd like them, too," Pieper said.

Although The Morning Star has no commercial-grade kitchen, Pieper said she would like to be allowed to hire caterers for functions on her property as well.

Eric Cattell, city assistant director for planning, said even if the board agreed on a new draft of the regulations by the next meeting, the proposal wouldn't go before the Manhattan City Commission until late January.

With the help from her children, Vernita Chambers breaks ground on her new home at 510 Colorado St. in Manhattan on Saturday. Manhattan Habitat for Humanity is building the house; it is the organization's sixth house in town. Chambers' children are (from back left) Dymond, 6; DeVante (middle), 5; Andre (front right), 9; and Champaign (not pictured), 10. Also on Saturday, Habitat for Humanity dedicated the fifth house it built.

It started with two women and a VISION

Now, several months and $32,000 later, that vision became REALITY

Story by M.A. Loroff
Photograph by Steve Hebert

In 1997, after watching a segment on Oprah, two members of Pi Beta Phi had a vision. The Pi Phis, Lindsey de la Torre and Aimee Jackson, wanted to be a part of the Angel Network and sponsor a Oprah House through Habitat for Humanity.

Jackson and de la Torre visited with the president of Manhattan Habitat for Humanity to share their vision to sponsor a house. Raising enough money would be a difficult task for the sorority — most of the houses have corporate sponsors — but they were allowed to take on the project.

"We believed enough in the spirit of the project," Debby Christian, Habitat president, said. Christian said she knew they would overcome hardships and finish the project.

The Pi Phis had various functions to raise money, including asking greek houses to miss a meal and donate the money they would have spent on food and writing letters for donations. Jackson and de la Torre said one of their happiest moments was when they were opening letters and finding checks for $5 and $10 inside.

"People that have the least tend to give the most," Jackson said.

Even though the group had days that didn't go its way, the Pi Phis raised more than $32,000.

■ MORE INFO?
Anyone interested in volunteering with Manhattan Habitat for Humanity can call 537-7545.

On Saturday, the Pi Phis watched their vision become a reality when Debra Johnson cut the yellow tape in front of her new home. Afterward, Johnson held the big scissors triumphantly above her head and invited everyone into her new home.

"This house is special because a group of girls raised the money," Johnson said.

The Oprah House is the fifth house built by Habitat for Humanity. Earlier in the day, Habitat broke ground for its sixth house, located at 510 Colorado St.

The house will go to Vernita Chambers and her children Champaign, Andre, Dymond and DeVante. The children said they enjoyed digging with the golden shovels.

"It's just like a pogo stick," Andre said while scooping shovels full of dirt.

Chambers said it didn't seem real that she actually would be getting a house until a committee from Habitat was asking her questions.

$12 million Fiedler Hall breaks ground

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Local and state dignitaries broke ground Friday for the $12 million Fiedler Hall and Library, the third phase of K-State's engineering complex that includes Durland and Rathbone halls.

GRAVES

The morning event culminated with Alice Fiedler cutting the ribbon to the western wall of Rathbone that by the summer of 2000 will be the entrance to the hall named for her and her late husband, George. With more than 200 in attendance, the spirit of the occasion was one of appreciation to a woman who has given more than $5.3 million to the College of Engineering for the hall.

Organizers hope week embraces diversity, unity

By AMANDA EWING
Kansas State Collegian

Coming together through understanding differences is what organizers of this year's Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week hope to teach K-State.

"Toward the 21st Century — Unity Through Understanding" is the theme for the 10th-annual Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week. Events of the week are designed to teach about differences among people and how to be more understanding of those differences.

The Harmony Walk on Sunday kicked off this year's events. Though the inclement weather prevented

'97 K-State grad dies, memorials planned

Matthew L. Burenheide, a 1997 K-State graduate, died Wednesday in Minnesota after falling off a roof while at work.

He was 24 years old.

Burenheide graduated from K-State with degrees in wildlife biology and natural resources and environmental science. While at K-State, Burenheide was a member of KSU Aikido Club, KSU Chapter of the Wildlife Society and served as a Quiet Garden Scholar with the St. Francis Episcopal Campus Ministry. He was a Lutheran Campus Ministry peer minister from 1996-1997 as well.

He was also class valedictorian at Northern Heights High School near Emporia, Kan., and an Eagle Scout. He had been working for a private company in St. Paul, Minn., rescuing domestic and wild animals from people's homes at the time of his death.

A memorial service will be at 11 a.m. Tuesday at St. Mark's Lutheran Church in Emporia. Matthew's wife, Sheri Burenheide, and their families suggest that instead of sending flowers, memorial gifts be made to the Matthew L. Burenheide Memorial Fund. The gifts will help establish a land and theology program at Luther Seminary in St. Paul; contribute to the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area and aid other causes that were important to him.

Cards and gifts should be sent to St. Mark's, K-State's Lutheran Campus Ministry, or to his wife, at 1608-B Eustis, Apt. 108, Lauderdale, MN., 55108.

A campus memorial service also will be at 5 p.m. Thursday in All Faiths Chapel.

Lutheran Campus Ministry will have a special commemoration for Burenheide on Oct. 18.

Gerald Ford calls for presidential rebuke

NEW YORK — President Clinton should appear in the well of the House of Representatives and receive a "harshly worded rebuke" from Congress this year for his affair with Monica Lewinsky, former President Ford said in Sunday's New York Times.

Breaking his silence on Clinton, Ford said Clinton should appear before Congress and "accept full responsibility for his actions, as well as for his subsequent efforts to delay or impede the investigation of them.

"No spinning, no semantics, no evasiveness or blaming others for his plight," the former Republican president wrote in an op-ed piece in the Times.

"Let all this be done without partisan exploitation or mean-spiritedness. Let it be dignified, honest and, above all, cleansing. The result, I believe, would be the first moment of majesty in an otherwise squalid year."

Ford said an apology would be inadequate and a fine would trivialize Clinton's misconduct.

He said the House Judiciary Committee should finish a preliminary inquiry into possible grounds for impeachment by the end of the year. Afterward, he said, the House might consider his proposal as a substitute for proceeding with the impeachment process.

"Imagine a very different kind of presidential appearance in the closing days of this year, not at the rostrum familiar to viewers from moments of triumph but in the well of the House. Imagine a president receiving not an ovation from the people's representatives but a harshly worded rebuke as rendered by members of both parties."

Ford said Clinton has broken faith with the electorate.

"At 85, I have no personal or political agenda, nor do I have any interest in 'rescuing' Bill Clinton," said Ford, who pardoned Richard Nixon in 1974 from any possible criminal charges after he resigned in the face of impeachment.

New Earhart Bridge could affect business

ATCHISON, Kan. — The site of a new bridge over the Missouri River is of no small interest to a Missouri ice cream seller and a Kansas manufacturer.

In the northwest Missouri town of Winthrop, Eunice Duttweiler is concerned about the future of her Sugar Cone Ice Cream store, Fisca service station and Best Deal grocery.

Across the river, the expansion plans of Atchison Casting might be affected.

Transportation officials in Kansas and Missouri are studying ways to replace the existing Amelia Earhart Memorial Bridge, which survived the 1993 flood but now is expensive to maintain.

Kansas officials have narrowed the options to four. Three would keep the bridge at its current site but widen it to four lanes. The fourth would route U.S. Highway 59 farther to the south.

If the road is widened, it might take out the front parking lots of the businesses owned by Duttweiler and her husband. If it is raised, motorists will find it harder to get off the highway to stop for an ice cream cone.

If Winthrop is bypassed, there may be no travelers at all.

"All the business will die, that's for sure," Duttweiler said. "There won't be any business."

Atchison Casting, which employs 760 people, wants to expand onto land it bought on the north side of the bridge but now finds itself landlocked.

"It's a tough problem from their standpoint with all the restrictions they have, the river travel, the railroad, the wetlands," company vice president Carl Surritt said of the Kansas Department of Transportation's options.

Businesses that are displaced by such projects are not treated as generously under federal guidelines as people who lose homes, said Joe Krahn, chief of the bureau of right of way for KDOT.

Homeowners get a comparable house in a different location or, failing that, the next-best house. For businesses, the government will only buy property and pay moving expenses.

Duttweiler said she and her husband probably would retire rather than try to move the businesses they have operated since 1980.

"For a lot of people, that's where they've lived all their lives, and they just wouldn't feel comfortable living anywhere else," said Bud Crockett, the Buchanan County, Mo., commissioner who represents the area.

Suspects can get out of jail with credit card

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Who needs a bail bondsman to get out of jail?

Starting this week, Santa Clara County will offer some suspects an interactive kiosk where they can use a credit card to get out of the slammer within minutes of being booked.

It's like an automatic teller machine, but instead of dispensing cash, it grants instant access out of jail.

The heaviest use is expected from those arrested for relatively minor crimes with bails under $5,000 — well within the limit many people carry on their credit cards. Crimes will include vandalism, assault, drunken driving and drug possession.

Defendants get the basic bail amount back from the county once the case is resolved — as long as they show up in court. If they use a bail bond agent or the kiosk, they pay a $500, nonrefundable fee.

County officials said the bail kiosks will reduce taxpayer costs and jail overcrowding.

Bail bondsmen said they hate the idea, claiming the service is illegal because it's not state-licensed, like they must be. They also said it's unfair competition.

"The first time I heard about this was last week, and I was flabbergasted," said Ted Wallace, president of the Santa Clara County Professional Bail Association. "We're definitely investigating our legal options."

Judicial Solutions, the company that operates the kiosk, said it doesn't need a license because it doesn't put up money for defendants but enables them to tap into their own credit lines.

"It's a fairly political product because the bail industry has had it to themselves for 240 years," John Bergmann, president of Judicial Solutions, said. "But we're definitely not bailing out O.J. Simpson; we're taking the crumbs."

San Luis Obispo, whose jail population of 500 inmates is about one-tenth the size of Santa Clara County's, has had a kiosk for four months.

Never go under with the Wildcat Card

With your Wildcat Card you just can't go wrong. It has special, rounded corners that won't poke or jab. Use it to call home. Use it to eat. Use it to wash your clothes or buy a pop. Whatever you use it for, it's waterproof and it floats so you won't have to worry about ever going under. Because it's NOT a credit card, it's a debit card—there's no interest to pay.

Other safety features include ATM access with your personal identification number, allows only you to have access to your money. And your photo prevents anyone else from using your card at a merchant. Use it on campus or around town like cash but don't worry about having the exact change—the Wildcat Card will take care of it.

K-State working to minimize year-2000 problem

By Gabe Eckert
Kansas State Collegian

Power outages, personal-computer problems and bank failures are all part of the doomsday scenario predicted for the year 2000.

Fortunately, K-State officials have been working for more than three years to ensure that students and faculty see few effects from the date change.

Problems associated with the year 2000 are a result of how computers originally were designed, said Beth Unger, vice provost for academic services and technology and dean of continuing education.

"When computers were first developed, their capacity was so small, we had to save as much storage as possible," she said. "As a result, two-digit numbers were used instead of four-digit numbers to calculate years."

The two-digit system has potential problems for the year 2000.

"With the date change from '99 to '00, computers could think '00 is before '99," Unger said. "Computers could actually think it's 1900 instead of the year 2000."

Unger said the university is working to minimize the effects of the date change.

"We first looked at the university's critical computing systems — the systems that must run for the university to do its business of education and research," she said. "We have great confidence our critical systems will be in good shape by the year 2000."

Critical systems include the university's information system, which includes student, faculty and university records.

Other year-2000 problem areas include data entry, mechanical systems and working with others outside the university.

The university's mechanical systems, which include elevators, aircraft and power production, will be ready for the year 2000, said Jane Rowlett, director of unclassified affairs and university compliance.

"We are going to exhaust every effort we have to make sure our mechanical systems are ready and that safety and health are ensured," she said.

Rowlett said many of these systems are already year-2000 operational.

She said the university already has invested more than 10,000 staff hours and $60,000 in replacing, upgrading and discontinuing computer systems.

While the university is working to ensure it's ready, it wants to help students and faculty do the same, Ann Kosch, year-2000 technical adviser, said.

Starting in November, students and faculty will be able to use a new computer lab in Hale 313 to see if their personal computers are ready for the date change. The lab will include a self-guided program that gives instructions on how to test personal computers for year-2000 compliance. Computing and Network Services staff also will be available to answer questions.

Kosch said the lab will benefit students and faculty.

"We wanted to be able to provide correct and safe testing instructions for students and faculty to use to test their personal computers," she said. "There is so much information out there, we are trying to make it more user friendly."

K-State is leading the nation in developing an educational year-2000 testing program, Kosch said.

"I think this is a unique concept," she said. "I haven't heard of any other university providing this kind of lab and learning environment."

Kosch said she hoped these new programs would help dispel some of the myths surrounding the year 2000.

"People sometimes hear information from the mass media that a variety of problems are associated with the year 2000," she said. "Hopefully, we can help people see that the doomsday scenario isn't likely."

Regulations hurting bed and breakfasts

Recent years have seen a tourism upswing in Manhattan, from day-trippers and the like; parents visiting their children at school for the weekend; tourists interested in a medium-sized town with its fair share of activities; salespersons and managers here to look at the market for their businesses.

While some might find all their lodging needs in the intimacy of the Holiday Inn & Holidome, others look to more private, personal accommodations. In Manhattan, this role is filled by bed and breakfasts, which make a niche for themselves by providing low-volume residency and a touch of charm that other area hotels cannot.

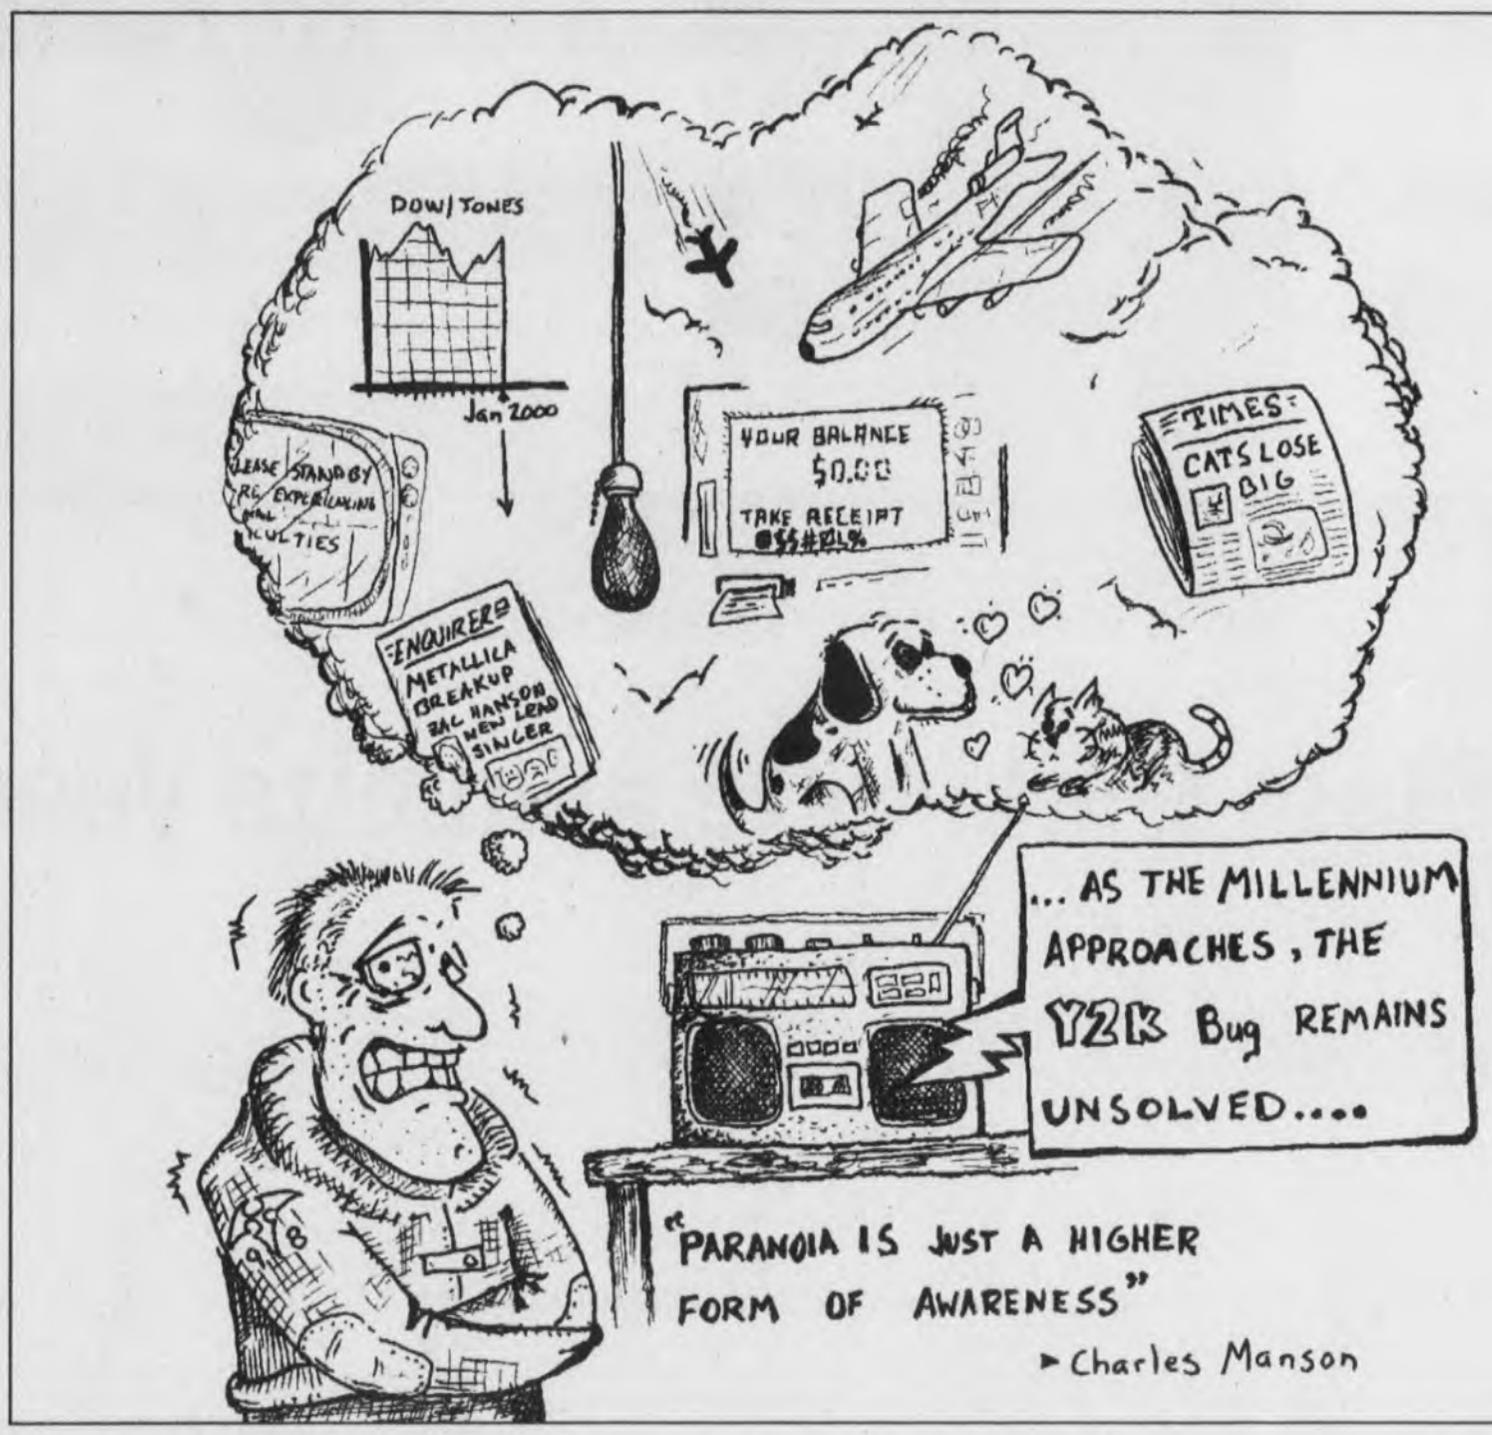
It is that charm factor that makes them unique. People want to capitalize on that and use bed and breakfasts to their fullest potential. Many see bed and breakfasts as delightful venues for meetings. They offer services that few others can provide.

The Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board, however, is preventing area bed and breakfasts from entertaining outside guests for luncheons, teas and meetings. Restrictions on meals they can serve as well as strict rules regarding guests are prohibitive to services like these. As the city-zoning statutes stand now, bed and breakfasts are not permitted to give meals to any non-guests, and the meals they serve to guests are limited to breakfast.

The zoning statutes also dictate that bed and breakfasts with more than four guest rooms must have a commercial-grade kitchen, the large, costly, mechanical conglomerations that include fume hoods and fire-supression systems. Because of the current statutes, however, these businesses cannot use those kitchens for more than bacon, eggs and bagels. The expense of constructing the kitchens combined with those of remodeling a house — which often can reach into the hundreds of thousands of dollars — is exorbitant.

The result is that bed and breakfasts are having trouble turning a profit. Originally, the zoning laws were passed to prevent city infrastructure problems associated with large volumes of people — heavy traffic in residential neighborhoods, parking problems, noise, etc. The city was cautious about this new business; nobody knew how well it would integrate into Manhattan's current scope.



But the truth is that these businesses are not a danger to anybody. Rather, they bring up the quality of life in a neighborhood by keeping their facilities in good condition. They add charm to the city, and they provide an original service. Certainly, noise is not going to be a problem — owners have invested too much to allow wild parties in their establishments, and the city can control parking by limiting seating at their daytime events.

Until problems are reported about these places, we should treat them like assets to our neighborhoods, and it is unlikely anyone will have a problem with a bed and breakfast.

They aren't just for breakfast anymore.

City has more to offer than beer

Editor,

I am writing in response to "Our View" in Friday's Collegian.

As responsible journalists, you must uphold a moral integrity. Putting "Beer. Enough said." as your opinion of the No. 1 thing to do in Manhattan on a bye week of K-State football is absurd. Did you check the K-State activity calendar before you wrote this, or were you writing with limited effort? Aggieville was No. 2. I was taught in high school that you should not be redundant.

I also have a problem with No. 4, root against Nebraska. We, as K-State football fans, need Nebraska to come to our house undefeated. Otherwise, they will not be ranked high enough for us to benefit from a victory in the polls. Research before you write. Better yet, just think a little bit more.

I must be fair, your No. 6 through No. 10 choices were applicable.

I believe as a informative piece of literature you should try to accent the really positive things in the community. Not the negative ones.

Also, please don't get me wrong — I have enjoyed plenty of alcohol during my time here at K-State. I just feel it is not proper for a newspaper to glorify that as the No. 1 (and basically No. 2) thing to do at K-State. It is not a good advertisement for our university.

Prohibition Era puts alcohol usage in perspective

As college students, our parents and elders most likely have told us, at one time or another, that our generation tends to take many things for granted. They remind us of how lucky we are — and this is true — because we have a roof over our heads, food on the table and clothes on our backs. And hey, we don't have to walk 10 miles to school in chest-deep snow ... OK, scratch that one. Parking Services already grants us that experience.

I doubt, however, that your parents ever have told you not to take alcohol for granted. After all, we live in a time and environment where alcohol is accessible, especially on a college campus. Even if you aren't of legal drinking age, chances are on any given weekend you'll find a friend of a friend of a friend who, for a price, will supply you with enough booze to make you intoxicated enough to do something quite foolish. In fact, I'll bet donuts to daiquiris you never stopped to consider the fact that there was a time when alcohol was quite scarce.

On Jan. 16, 1919, the United States ratified the 18th Amendment, which prohibited the manufacture and sale of alcohol. The good intentions that the U.S. government had with this new law were met with an astounding rise in crime rates and death tolls across the nation for the next 14 years.

The Prohibition Era proved just how much America is reliant upon alcohol. Alcohol was an integral part of the Roaring Twenties, right up there with Al Capone, flagpole sitting, flappers, jazz music and the Harlem Renaissance. When it was taken away, a longtime piece of American society went as well. When the pleasure of enjoying alcohol was taken from Americans, they fought back in the only way they knew how — they tried to beat the system.

Bootleggers from all over were making a small fortune by supplying Americans with illegal brew. Even Capone and his henchmen got a piece of the action.

Prohibition cast a dark cloud upon a society that was, and still is, dependent upon alcohol; it was a substance that went hand in hand with the "party, party, party" lifestyle of the time period. A great sigh of relief was uttered when Prohibition was repealed in 1933, when the 21st Amendment was ratified.

Now, nearly 60 years later, can we really imagine a society without alcohol? There is so much of it accessible to us that we may not stop to think what the effect would be. Locally, the worst that could happen is the downfall of Aggieville, an area known for its numerous bars. On a grander scale, beer is consumed in large quantities at athletic events, and wine is an ever-present beverage at various special occasions, such as weddings, New Year's Eve parties and bar mitzvahs. If the consumption of alcohol were outlawed again, these traditions quickly would die.

In Europe, meanwhile, the policy is if you can see over the bar, you can drink. It is almost expected of you.

Though some might not like to admit it, alcohol is a large part of societies, both at home and abroad. As college students, nearly all of us can comprehend this elementary idea. Either we drink now, have done so in the past or have at least been asked or pressured to drink. I can't think of anyone who would claim that they haven't had any of these experiences. It is an issue to which we all can relate.

I'm not advocating by any means the excessive abuse of alcohol; it is too often abused, which can lead to injury or death. It is an addictive substance, and life without alcohol would nonetheless mean an end to alcoholism and domestic abuse. Then again, the people at Alcoholics Anonymous would be unemployed.

We have to be realistic. They found a way around the system in the 1920s and enjoyed alcohol regardless. If Prohibition reared its ugly head again, we probably would do the same. Alcohol is such a large part of our lifestyles in the United States and around the world, if the anti-Prohibitionists found a way to drink in the 1920s, so would we.

We easily can see that there are advantages and disadvantages to life without alcohol. Thankfully (or unfortunately, however you look at it), it doesn't seem that history will repeat itself anytime soon.

Sometimes best lessons are taught on bumper stickers

Newspaper editorials and lectern-thumping speeches are used to rally support for a number of causes, but sometimes a bumper sticker says it best.

"A woman's place is in the House and the Senate."

I have seen versions of that sticker that mention the White House as well, and I have to agree.

In a perfect world, Hillary Rodham Clinton would be president, and Elizabeth Dole would be the Senate majority leader. Imagine it, a balanced government that acknowledges the needs of women as much as the needs of men. A democracy where the rhetoric of testosterone is not the order of the day.

It is not as if having these women in positions of power would be a sacrifice. I want nothing but the best leaders to run the country. Clinton and Dole are both more than qualified for the jobs. Both have served in various leadership positions, both paid and unpaid.

Clinton was a partner at a highfalutin' law firm and made a fine effort to reform the nation's health-care system. She did a darn good job of dealing with two of the most feared groups of people on the planet: lawyers and doctors.

Dole has been at the helm of the American Red Cross for a number of years now. I have worked at some non-profit agencies and let me tell you, it is no walk in the park. It is all about fund raising. This woman could have this country making money and taking care of ourselves before you know it.

Perhaps the biggest hurdles on the way to gaining public office, and the key to keeping it, are appearance and approval. Both woman are pleasant to look at and well-spoken. Both have managed to keep a family together and have careers. Both Dole and Clinton have done something I rarely have seen men do: play second fiddle to their spouses.

Conservatives can support the pair for their commitment to family, church and husbands. Liberals can support Clinton and Dole because, well, most of us would do just about anything to get a woman in the White House and more women in the Senate.

More importantly, both women know how to shovel the poop when it is needed. After all, Clinton has worked with lawyers and doctors, and Dole knows all about fund raising.

The public wants versatility in its leaders. These two women have that, too. Clinton looks as confident sitting on top of an elephant in Africa as she does speaking at a $5,000-a-plate fund raiser in Washington, D.C. Dole can don a hardhat after a tornado in Texas and then join a room full of suits for a policy meeting in New York.

As for strength and character, both women have put up with more from their husbands than any mortal woman should. Dole has suffered through unsuccessful runs for the White House by her husband. She even took a leave of absence from her job as president of the American Red Cross Board of Governors so she could play the happy, supportive wife before his last embarrassment at the polls.

Hillary Rodham Clinton has gone through hell and high Whitewater for Bill Clinton. Before the current intern crisis, there was Gennifer Flowers, Paula Jones and who knows how many others.

I am not suggesting that having these two women in power would solve all of the nation's problems, but it couldn't hurt to try. They couldn't do much worse than the herd of men we have leading us around now.

ON THE ROAD AGAIN

Big 12 powers not in big hurry for next road games

BY DENNE H. FREEMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Nebraska, Colorado and Texas A&M will attest that Big 12 road games can be dangerous.

All three teams barely escaped determined opponents playing for home crowds on Saturday.

No. 2-ranked Nebraska needed a goal-line stand to subdue Oklahoma State 24-17 in Kansas City, Mo.

Joe Walker's 73-yard punt return for a touchdown was the difference for Nebraska. He needed to do it because earlier he had allowed Ethan Howell to escape for a 67-yard touchdown pass to tie the score for the Cowboys.

"That's part of football," Walker said. "You gamble and sometimes you win, and sometimes you lose."

Nebraska coach Frank Solich said "Joe about did me in with a couple of plays on defense and then the punt return. He's an electrifying player."

OSU hadn't beaten Nebraska since 1961 but came close. The Cowboys were on the Nebraska 1-yard line when the game ended after Nathan Simmons was stopped by a swarm of Nebraska tacklers.

"It could have gone either way," Simmons said. "It just didn't go our way."

Colorado had to hold on for dear life at Norman before the No. 15 Buffaloes outlasted Oklahoma 27-25.

It prompted Colorado quarterback Mike Moschetti to say, "We're winning ugly, but we can't be too depressed. We're 5-0."

Unbeaten Texas Tech (5-0, 2-0 Big 12) was at home in Jones Stadium and still had a hard time, beating Baylor 31-29 as a late 2-point conversion attempt failed.

Tech is on course for its best season in 22 years, when the Raiders opened 8-0.

"I've never been around a team with better chemistry," said Tech coach Spike Dykes. "Winning breeds winning. They're getting used to success."

Baylor thought it tied the game on a 2-point pass by Jermaine Alfred, but officials ruled he had stepped out of bounds before he threw the pass.

Tech's Ricky Williams gained 159 yards rushing while Texas' Williams continued his assault on the NCAA record books when he rushed 37 times 350 yards and five touchdowns in the Longhorn's win against the Cyclones, 53-33.

"If the line keeps blocking like it is, I think I have a good chance for the Heisman," said Williams, who is now fourth on the NCAA division 1-A career rushing list.

No. 23 Missouri took a week away from family feuds to beat Northwestern State 35-14 and improve its record to 4-1 and 1-0. The Tigers play at Iowa State this week.

Nebraska (5-0, 1-0) gets another tester this week as it travels to noisy Kyle Field to take on the Aggies (4-1, 1-0), the team it defeated last December at San Antonio in the Big 12 championship game.

Oklahoma State (2-2,0-1) is at Texas Tech (5-0, 2-0), while Texas (3-2, 0-1) and Oklahoma (2-2, 0-1) collide in their annual showdown in the Cotton Bowl at Dallas.

And No. 18 Texas A&M had to drive 75 yards late in the game to beat Kansas 24-21 in Lawrence.

Dante Hall scored on three touchdown runs, but it took a 75-yard drive late in the game before A&M settled matters on Hall's 3-yard touchdown run.

"I felt that was the best drive we've had all season," said quarterback Randy McCown. "Those are the ones you always see John Elway and Joe Montana do."

No. 5 K-State had the pleasure of a week off while all the nail-biters took place.

K-State (4-0, 1-0) joins the nervousness this week as it travels to Boulder to take or Colorado (4-0, 2-0) in an early-season North division showdown.

TROUBLE in TEXAS

Volleyball team struggles on trip into Lone Star state

BY BRENT STOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

That rally made the score 13-7, and K-State would never recover, surviving three game points before folding 8-15.

Some matches just leave you with a bad feeling.

The K-State volleyball team was left with that feeling twice this weekend.

"This same thing happened last year," junior Linsey Luther said. "We just have to put it behind us and go on."

For the second straight season, the Cats were swept on their trip to Texas and Texas A&M. However, Friday night against the Longhorns, everything started off according to plan.

In the first game of the match, the Cats shocked the 13th-ranked Longhorns by stealing a 15-9 victory. Texas jumped on the Cats early in Game 1, jumping out to a 3-0 lead, which eventually would stretch to a 7-2 advantage.

K-State came storming back with a 6-0 run to jump ahead 8-7. The Wildcats went on to make it a 13-2 run on the way to the victory. It was just the second time in history that a K-State team had taken a game from the Longhorns.

In Game 2 , after a 2-2 tie, Texas used a 6-2 run to grab an 8-4 advantage. K-State had a 3-0 spurt during Lisa Mimick's service rally. Texas ended that rally with a devastating block on Kim Zschau. From there, the Cats allowed Texas to pull away.

"We let down mentally," Luther said. "We just thought that it would come easy, and it didn't."

Katie Austin served Texas to five consecutive points, a run that included two attack errors, another block on Zschau and an ace awarded to the Longhorns when K-State lined up out of rotation. That rally made the score 13-7, and K-State would never recover, surviving three game points before folding 8-15.

K-State got out to a big lead for the first time in the match to start Game 3. After holding a 2-all tie early, the Cats ripped off six-consecutive points to grab an 8-2 advantage. However, Texas tore off five consecutive points to pull within 8-7, then battle to tie the game at 10-10.

K-State pulled out to a 12-10 advantage, but Texas hammered home four straight from there to grab a 14-12 edge. The Longhorns went on to win 15-13.

K-State again had four-point leads both early and late in Game 4. However, it let Texas back in again with runs and failures to side out at critical opportunities.

Texas closed out the game and the match in impressive fashion with a 9-1 run.

"It was a situation where this was the first time we've come down here and said we're disappointed that we didn't win," K-State coach Jim McLaughlin said.

"I'm a little disappointed in the team," he said. "Playing with a team doesn't mean anything. Beating a team means something, and that's what I talked to the team about after this match."

One bright spot in the match was Kim Zschau. The senior led K-State's kills with 16, giving her 1,390 for her career.

Saturday night, the Cats traveled to College Station, Texas, only to get swept by 16th-ranked Texas A&M.

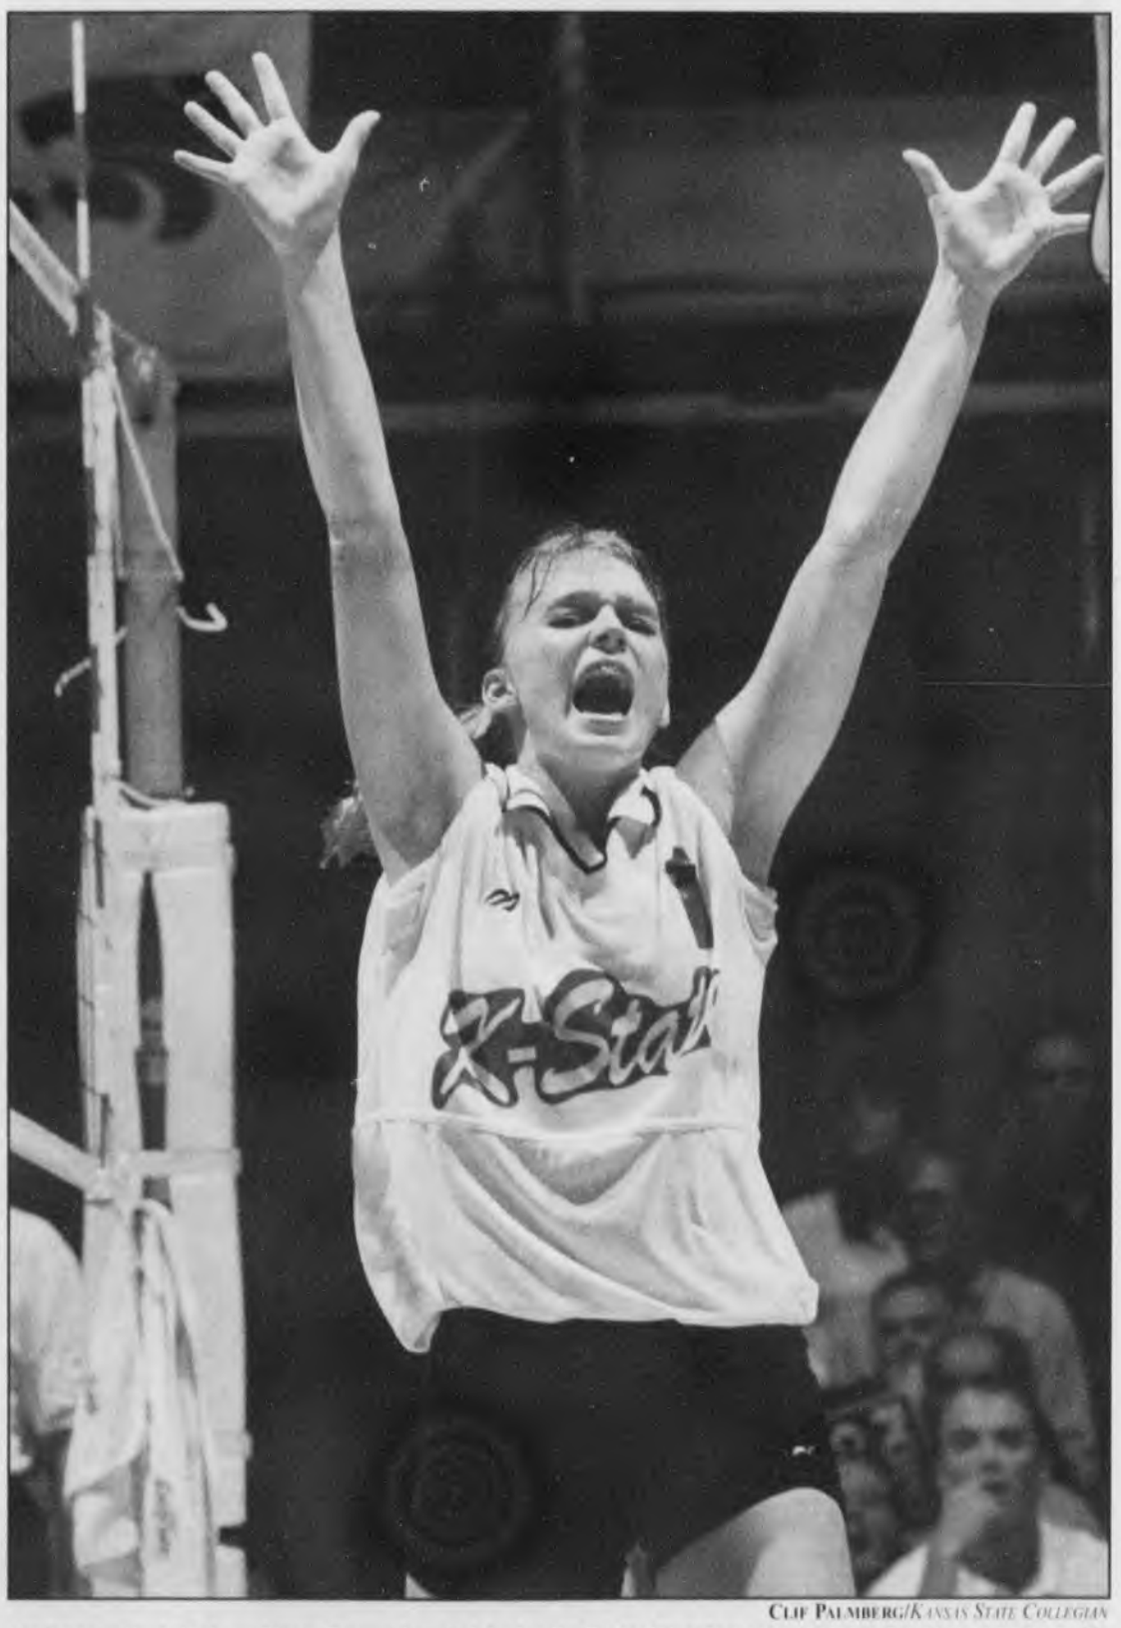
K-State had early leads of 2-1 and 4-3 in Game 1, but the Aggies used a 9-2 spurt to grab a 12-6 lead. However, K-State fought back with a 7-1 run to tie the game at 13 before A&M put home the final two points of a 15-13 game win.

The Cats again let A&M jump out to a big lead in Game 2. This time it was an early 7-2 advantage that the Aggies eventually stretched to 13-4. K-State went on a 5-1 run to get as close as 14-9, but after failing on four game-point opportunities, A&M put the game away with an ace on their fifth game-point chance.

Game 3 was a back-and-forth contest. K-State had early leads of 3-1 and 4-2. However, the Aggies pulled away in the end with a 15-10 victory for the game and the match.

Dawn Cady led the Wildcat offense with 16 kills and a .406 attack percentage. She also added 11 digs on defense.

Kim Zschau also notched a double-double with 11 kills and 13 digs. However, Zschau hit .000 for the match and was aced five times on defense.



"When we handle the ball well, we play well," McLaughlin said.

"Tonight was a case of not handling the ball."

The Cats now will look ahead to another road trip this weekend. K-State will travel to Iowa State on Friday night and Missouri on Saturday night. However, there's work to be done between now and then.

"Different people are playing at different times," McLaughlin said. "At some time, we have to play together at the same time.

"We have to get back into the gym and work — that's what'll get us through this thing. This was a tough weekend."

NFL ROUNDUP

week five

Bills 26, 49ers 21

ORCHARD PARK, N.Y. — Rob Johnson threw for 254 yards and a touchdown, and Buffalo shut down San Francisco's high-powered offense for most of the game before surviving a late rally and beating the 49ers 26-21 Sunday.

The Bills, who won only one of their previous 10 games, built a 23-0 lead in the third quarter before the 49ers staged a comeback and pulled within 26-21 on Steve Young's 21-yard TD pass to J.J. Stokes with 1:03 left.

San Francisco (3-1) then recovered an onside kick, but the play was wiped out by an offsides penalty against the 49ers, their NFL-record 22nd penalty of the game. Buffalo (1-3) recovered the second onside attempt to clinch the victory.

Bears 31, Lions 27

CHICAGO — Erik Kramer threw two TD passes and ran for a score as the Chicago Bears rallied for their first win of the season.

The Bears (1-4), who trailed 27-10 going into the fourth quarter, held Barry Sanders to 28 yards on 14 carries, one of the worst games of his career.

Kramer was 26-of-37 for 275 yards, while Chris Penn caught six passes for a career-high 106 yards. Lions rookie Charlie Batch was 16-of-31 for 268 yards and two TDs, and Johnnie Morton caught two passes for 138 yards, including a 98-yard TD catch.

Falcons 51, Panthers 23

ATLANTA — Tim Dwight returned the opening kickoff 93 yards for a touchdown, and the Atlanta Falcons scored their most points in 25 years by routing the winless Carolina Panthers.

Atlanta (3-1) scored three touchdowns in a 48-second span of the third quarter. Carolina (0-4) fumbled on its first three possessions of the second half and finished with six turnovers.

Dwight set the tone when he took John Kasay's opening kickoff at the 7, cut through a gaping hole on the left side and cruised all the way to the end zone.

Colts 17, Chargers 12

INDIANAPOLIS — It was billed as the rookie showdown between Peyton Manning and Ryan Leaf, but Elijah Alexander and Ken Dilger stole the show and led Indianapolis to its first win of the season.

Alexander intercepted a pass by Leaf to set up one touchdown and recovered a fumble to set up another. Dilger ran in a 2-point conversion on a well-executed fake after the TD and recovered an onside kick after the Chargers had pulled within two points with 1:48 left.

That led to Mike Vanderjagt's third field goal, a 40-yarder that clinched the game for the Colts (1-4). Manning was 12-of-23 for 137 yards with an interception, while Leaf was 12-of-23 for 150 yards with an interception for the Chargers (2-3).

New York Yankees teammates pay visit to hospitalized Darryl Strawberry

BY RONALD BLUM
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Hearing the good news secondhand wasn't good enough so half a dozen New York Yankees visited Darryl Strawberry on Sunday, a day after a cancerous tumor was removed from the outfielder's colon.

Pitcher David Cone intended to bring one of the Yankees' caps, which now have Strawberry's number 39 stitched in white on the back.

"We just want to show him how much we care — and we got the job done he wanted us to do," Cone said before joining teammates Chili Davis, Joe Girardi, Derek Jeter and Tim Raines on the trip to Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center, about a mile from Yankee Stadium.

Strawberry was on the Yankees' minds as they prepared for Tuesday's start of the AL championship series against Cleveland. Dr. Stuart Hershon, the Yankees' team physician, held a clubhouse meeting and gave an update on Strawberry's condition.

Hershon told them doctors believe the cancer had not spread, but they won't know for sure until tests come back in about 10 days. Doctors removed a 16-inch portion of Strawberry's large intestine to get rid of a tumor almost 2-1/2 inches long.

"I think we felt a lot better because everything came out well," Tino Martinez said. "There's a lot of relief around here. Our thoughts are still with him, but there's a lot better feeling around here."

Strawberry remained in stable condition Sunday. He is expected to remain in the hospital for about a week.

"He's doing well. His family is with him," Columbia-Presbyterian spokeswoman Szuping Di said.

Strawberry also got a visit from George Steinbrenner, who didn't make it clear whether he went Saturday, Sunday or both.

"I was with him all day," Steinbrenner said at Yankee Stadium without elaborating.

The Yankees were shaken when they learned last Thursday that Strawberry had a cancerous tumor.

New York manager Joe Torre, who also visited the 36-year-old outfielder, predicted Strawberry's illness will increase the awareness of colon cancer among the Yankees.

"Knowing George Steinbrenner, there'll be very thorough exams," Torre said.

Jets 20, Dolphins 9

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — Curtis Martin rushed for 108 yards and a touchdown as the New York Jets snapped a four-game losing streak to Miami.

Dan Marino had a poor day for the Dolphins (3-1), going 13-of-31 for 121 yards, getting sacked three times and throwing two interceptions. Miami's running attack also sputtered, gaining just 34 yards.

Vinny Testaverde, subbing at quarterback again for injured Glenn Foley, threw a 10-yard TD pass to Keyshawn Johnson for the Jets (2-2).

Cowboys 31, Redskins 10

LANDOVER, Md. — Jason Garrett, Emmitt Smith and Chris Warren had big days as Dallas routed winless Washington.

Garrett completed 14 of 17 passes for 169 yards and a touchdown, while Smith and Warren each ran for 100 yards and combined for three touchdowns for Dallas (3-2).

Smith ran for 120 yards and a touchdown, and Warren rushed for 104 yards and two TDs against the Redskins (0-5), who are off to their worst start since 1981.

Patriots 30, Saints 27

NEW ORLEANS — Adam Vinatieri kicked a a 27-yard field goal with three seconds left as New England handed New Orleans its first loss of the season.

After New Orleans tied it on Doug Brien's 37-yard field goal with 1:29 remaining, Drew Bledsoe completed four passes to set up the game-winning field goal for the Patriots (3-1).

The Saints (3-1) had tied the game 27-27 after a heady play by punt returner Andre Hastings. After the Patriots punted, New England's Tebucky Jones batted the ball out of the end zone to Larry Whigham, who unsuccessfully tried to down it. Hastings grabbed the ball and raced 76 yards to the Patriots 26, setting up O'Brien's field goal six plays later.

Broncos 41, Eagles 16

DENVER — Bubby Brister, filling in for ailing John Elway, threw four touchdown passes and Terrell Davis ran for 168 yards and two scores as Denver routed Philadelphia.

The defending Super Bowl champions (5-0) built a 35-2 halftime lead and 41-2 advantage after three quarters before Charlie Garner ran for a pair of 3-yard scores in the final period for the winless Eagles (0-5).

Davis, the NFL's leading rusher, had 120 yards and both of his touchdowns in the first quarter and finished the half with 168 yards.

Bucs 20, Giants 3

TAMPA, Fla. — Tampa Bay bounced back from an embarrassing Monday night loss, playing inspired defense to beat the Giants.

Charles Mincy returned an interception 22 yards for a touchdown on the third play of the game, and Regan Upshaw and Ronde Barber also picked off passes for Tampa Bay (2-3), which was coming off a 21-point loss to Detroit.

The Bucs held New York (2-3) to 135 yards in total offense.

Raiders 23, Cardinals 20

Hollas was 12-of-22 for 104 yards and scored on a 1-yard run for the Raiders (3-2), who were trailing 7-3 when he entered the game.

Jake Plummer was 23-of-39 for 208 yards and two touchdowns, but had three interceptions that cost the Cardinals (2-3) their chance at winning three straight games for the first time in two years.

Due to production deadlines, results from Sunday night's Kansas City Chiefs game against the Seattle Seahawks were unavailable as of press time. See Tuesday's Collegian for coverage of the game.

Padres to make return trip to NLCS

By BERNIE WILSON
The Associated Press

SAN DIEGO — The San Diego Padres are going back to the NL championship series after a 14-year absence, thanks in large part to new hero Jim Leyritz.

And the Big Unit is not going to make it to the World Series as many thought, because the Padres beat Randy Johnson and the Houston Astros 6-1 Sunday night to clinch the tense division series three games to one.

With the crowd of 64,898 hanging on every pitch, Leyritz hit his third homer in as many games and 27-year-old Sterling Hitchcock was dominating in his first playoff start, using a devastating split-fingered fastball to strike out 11 in six innings.

Johnson lost his fifth-straight decision in the postseason, tying a major league record. He left for a pinch-hitter in the seventh, and reliever Jay Powell gave up pinch-hitter John Vander Wal's two-run triple and Wally Joyner's two-run homer in the eighth.

"Everybody counted us out," Hitchcock said. "They said we couldn't beat Johnson twice in a five-game series. Well, we beat him twice in a four-game series. These guys never let up."

Trevor Hoffman closed out the ninth for the Padres, who move on to face the Atlanta Braves in the NL championship series starting Wednesday night at Turner Field. Atlanta won five of nine from the Padres this year.

This is the first time the Padres have been this far since 1984, when they beat the Chicago Cubs in the NLCS only to lose the World Series 4-1 to Detroit.

Tony Gwynn, 38, is the only player left from that Padres team, although Bruce Bochy is the manager and Tim Flannery the third base coach.

The Astros, who led the NL in scoring this season but managed just eight runs in this series, went home frustrated for a second-straight year, having been swept by Atlanta in the first round in 1997. Houston has been in five postseason series, and lost all of them.

Ricky Gutierrez kneeled in the on-deck circle for a few minutes after the game ended, sending the Padres bursting out of the dugout and fireworks bursting overhead. Craig Biggio sat in the dugout, staring at the scene.

Johnson was brilliant after being traded from Seattle to Houston on July 31, going 10-1 with a 1.28 ERA. But the Padres beat him twice this series.

Leyritz homered for the third-straight game and for the sixth time in 34 postseason at-bats.

He sent the crowd into a frenzy with his 422-foot homer to left-center on a 3-1 pitch from Johnson leading off the second. Leyritz had been just 4-for-37 (.108) with one home run lifetime off Johnson.

"This time of day, it's hard to see the ball," Leyritz said. "I just swung in the right place and, with his velocity, was able to hit it out.

"We struggled in September once we clinched, but we were able to step it up a notch," said Leyritz, obtained from the Boston Red Sox on June 21.

The Padres won Saturday night's game 2-1 thanks to Leyritz's solo homer to left with one out in the seventh. On Thursday, his pinch-hit, two-run shot with two out in the ninth off Billy Wagner sailed just inside the foul pole in right, tying the game at 4. The Astros came back and won it 5-4 in the bottom of the ninth.

Leyritz is best known for his dramatic homer for the New York Yankees in Game 4 of the the 1996 World Series against Atlanta. His three-run, eighth-inning shot against Mark Wohlers tied the game at 6. The Yankees went on to win and defeated the Braves in six games.

Students work, learn together

■ K-State students learn management skills — with popsicle sticks

BY GABE ECKERT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They came together to do more than just build a bridge. They wanted to learn how the process worked.

Students in biology, business administration and engineering worked for slightly more than an hour on Saturday to build a bridge made from Popsicle sticks.

The activity was sponsored by the K-State chapter of the Project Management Institute. It followed a presentation by Phil Buckley, principal engineer for Midwest Research Institute and vice president of membership for the Kansas City chapter of the Project Management Institute.

"The benefit isn't that the bridges are a success but that we learned from the process of building them," Buckley said.

The process students learned is project management, he said. Project management is the application of knowledge, skills, tools and techniques to project activities in order to meet or exceed stakeholder needs and expectations from a project.

"Project management is simple, but the detail and interaction with people makes it difficult," Buckley said.

Projects like this stress the importance of working together, he said.

"The most important project-management skill is to understand people. Project management is a people business," Buckley said.

Employers seek skills developed from project management, said Glen Uffelmann, senior in construction science and vice president of operations for the chapter.

"Knowing what is going on in a company and how to manage company projects is an invaluable tool," Uffelmann said. "Projects like these really help us to understand the real-world implications of what we are learning in class."

Christine Mair, graduate student in business administration, said she agreed with Uffelmann.

"Project management provides skills people can use in any job," she said. "The most helpful part of doing projects like these is seeing what problems occurred and learning from them."

Uffelmann said the benefits of understanding project management are not limited to the workplace.

"Today, we showed others how project management can help their careers and personal lives," he said. "We showed them how simple and practical project management is."

Regents select new president of WSU; choice praised by campus community

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — Don Beggs, self-described as plain-spoken and a lover of people, will succeed Gene Hughes as president of Wichita State University.

Beggs, 57, has been chancellor of Southern Illinois University at Carbondale for the past two years.

He was selected Saturday by the Kansas Board of Regents over two other finalists to replace Hughes, who is retiring after five years.

"Boy, this is special!" Beggs said after hearing the announcement. He will become Wichita State's 12th president on Jan. 1, with an annual salary of $152,678.

The board also considered Joel Anderson, provost and vice chancellor for academic affairs at the University of Arkansas-Little Rock, and Nicholas Henry, former president of Georgia Southern University.

Anderson and Henry both were capable and qualified, but Beggs seemed "the best fit at this time," Bill Docking, regents chairman, said.

"I hope you see me as a gregarious person who likes to meet people," Beggs said. "I don't read speeches, and I don't read scripts. I am what I am."

Beggs spent 15 years as dean of the College of Education at Carbondale before replacing the previous chancellor, who left for health reasons.

Some people on campus had campaigned for him to stay in the job, but Beggs said he had committed himself to serving just two years.

At Wichita State, he had the support of the faculty, said Jay Mandt, president-elect of the Faculty Senate.

Faculty leaders said they liked the fact that Beggs, author of a nationally standardized test for children in grades three through 12, had remained an active scholar and not just an administrator.

"I've lived their life," Beggs said.

He also had the support of students, impressing them with his personable and genuine demeanor, said Sean Robinson, vice president of the Student Government Association.

Beggs said he was given no directives by the regents and had not developed a firm agenda.

He said he foresaw no significant changes in the university's mission of serving a complex community and a student body with a mix of ages and ethnic backgrounds.

Native American group hopes to dispel myths, offer forum

■ MORE INFO?
The NASB first meeting is at 5 p.m. Oct. 8 in the Union Little Theatre following a 4 p.m. demonstration of American Indian dances as part of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

BY SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tammy Goodson still remembers her shock when she was asked by elementary school children if she lived in a teepee.

Goodson, senior in art and president of Native American Student Body, said she was presenting the native dances of her tribe, the Otoe-Missouria Iowa, at a local elementary school when questions from the children showed the same stereotypes she's heard before.

"They wanted to know if I still live in a teepee or rode a horse to get there. It blows my mind," Goodson said.

Stereotypes on the college level might not be as extreme. As NASB gets ready for its first fall meeting Oct. 8, Goodson said the group hopes to show other K-State students the truth behind American Indian culture.

"Mostly, we're about teaching people what Indians are about and what culture means in daily life. We want people to come and see our culture firsthand," she said.

People are not required to have any American Indian heritage to join NASB or attend the functions, but they need only a strong interest in exploring the culture of the individual tribes, Goodson said.

"A lot of people think 'I can't go to that, it's sacred,' but that's not true. We want people to understand us better," she said.

Upcoming events will be discussed at the meeting, including an open-mike forum in the Union Courtyard from noon to 1 p.m. on Oct. 12.

The fact that the forum is scheduled on Columbus Day is no coincidence, Goodson said. The forum is titled "American Indian Day," and speakers from NASB will address the issue of Columbus Day as a tradition.

While American holidays such as Hanukkah and St. Patrick's Day celebrate ethnic groups, there is no national American Indian holiday, she said.

"It's not like a protest. It's an awareness of the holiday," Goodson said.

Quinton Shaw, junior in communications, environmental studies and American ethnic studies, said the opportunity to educate others about cultures like his Osage background drew him to join the NASB last year and return this year as vice president.

In addition to the Columbus Day discussion, Shaw said he wants to raise issues such as American Indian mascots for sports teams and the government's treatment of tribes today during the year.

"I don't think anyone's evil. It's dispelling some myths that people have created," Shaw said.

Shaw said he hopes events throughout the year bring in a large group to expose students to a culture with which they might not be familiar.

"People are starting to get involved or at least looking at cultures more," he said.

If educating non-American Indians is half of the NASB's task, the other half is to give American Indian students a place to meet others of similar backgrounds and explore their cultures, Goodson said. However, finding those students at K-State can be the biggest challenge.

When she was vice president of the Native American Student Association at Oklahoma State University two years ago, Goodson said nearly 2,000 students of American Indian heritage enrolled every semester. At K-State, roughly 175 students are listed as "Native American," many of whom are listed incorrectly, she said.

Of students with American Indian heritage successfully contacted, most who were interested in NASB have been freshmen or transfer students like Goodson.

Locating such students means much more than just extra volunteers for activities, Harald Prins, academic adviser for NASB, said.

Many students of American Indian background come to K-State from close-knit rural communities that make Manhattan seem all the more intimidating without a support system.

"There's a seeking of solidarity, of support," Prins said.

Making students feel more welcome among others of tribal background can reduce a dropout rate that is already too high among American Indian students in colleges nationwide, he said.

CONSPIRACY THEORY

TAYLOR GRIMES

Margaret Buie has a watercolor show at the Manhattan Center for the Arts. Buie, who primarily works in metalsmithing, watercolors and weaving, recently has been working on projects called "watercolor monotype mixed media constructions," using combinations of different media in her work.

2 watercolorists approach subject quite differently

BY RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Save farming, one only can attempt to think of a more highly charged subject in the imagination of Kansans than that of the landscape.

We might think the matter of weather is the true topic of conversation in this state, but not so. It's never really the weather itself that is of importance; it's what that weather is doing to us and, more specifically, our land.

Whether it's flooding in east Manhattan, ruining recently sown fields or flattening ripe wheat days before harvest, the weather matters only because of the landscape.

Naturally, our artists recognize this fact of Kansas life, which brings us to the matter of the work of Margaret Buie and Jim Hagan. Both local artists, the two are included in a show of recent work at the Manhattan Center for the Arts until Oct. 30.

The show is an interesting pairing. Hagan paints generally somber landscapes of Kansas — paintings that are instantly recognizable as typically Kansas but not motivated by history or nostalgia. More often than not, a Hagan watercolor consists of a road cascading down a hill of exposed limestone and scraggly trees or a placid portrait of a farm house and outbuildings.

Hagan describes himself as a "painter," but what separates Hagan from, say, a house painter are the touches of creativity that we associate with an artist. This explains why a perfectly representational work like "Winter Creek," watercolor, is quietly swelling with touches of color, whether it's the sky-blue reflection or the spill of purple down the bank — artistic flourishes if ever there were.

Although some examples of large-scale work are in acrylic, Hagan's work is looser and freer in watercolor. A Hagan sky in a watercolor melts on the horizon, while the same scene in acrylic is a bit heavy-handed and stilted by mannered brushstroke. The simple subjects succeed best, be they exposed rocks, birds in a tree or a winding road.

A man who cares little for art theory or criticism, Hagan describes his process simply.

"I see things, and I put them down. That's what I do," Hagan said.

"I paint what attracts me. I enjoy being out, seeing and wandering around the country. From that comes the paintings."

If Hagan considers himself a mere painter, Buie easily is an artist. Her watercolors reveal a love of process and experimentation, playfulness and variety. For Buie, a Scottish landscape mingles nature with the built environment, while one of her constructed pieces blends media with watercolor and found objects.

Consider Buie's splendid "Pics There Did Dwell," watercolor (1998), in which various hues of green take on almost art nouveau flourishes of organic patches of color in the landscape brush, while the composition is framed by the underarch of a stone bridge. Or see the fun Buie surely had putting together "Sisters," watercolor, construction, collage and mixed media (1997). It brings a portrait of her three daughters and popular images and relics from their childhoods within one frame.

Buie traveled to Scotland with a group of art professors and students from K-State as part of an annual exchange.

"There was something that really clicked — a combination of what I was seeing and hearing about the history," Buie said, recalling her three weeks living in a Scottish castle and observing the landscape.

"The land has been lived in for so long that there is virtually no part of the land that hasn't been dug in or lived on. There's a continuity of history in the landscape."

Kansas is not Scotland, but Hagan and Buie prove there are qualities to be painted in both kinds of landscapes — our almost pristine prairie and foreign grasslands that have seen centuries of history.

Internet risks can be avoided

BY JOHN FRANSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The nightmare Internet scenarios portrayed in Hollywood movies might be unlikely, but Internet use does present real risks that can cause real harm.

The computer virus is one of the most widespread risks, said Harvard Townsend, Computing and Network Services interim director.

These pesky critters are contained within executable program files that a user downloads or receives. When the file is run, the virus begins to cause problems that range from annoying to devastating. The contents of an entire hard drive can be lost.

However, a virus cannot be contracted by merely surfing the Web, Townsend said.

"Just surfing, in and of itself, isn't going to give you a virus," he said. "The only way you're going to get a virus is if you download some software or receive it from someone in some way."

Townsend said that to determine whether a file is virus-free, an up-to-date anti-virus program is needed. Most anti-virus programs can be downloaded for a free-trial period.

"Scan the disk or the file before you ever execute it, or use it, or open it, and then you should be safe that way — assuming you have an up-to-date virus scanner, since they are changing all the time," Townsend said. "Something that's a year old may not catch the virus that you're infected with."

Chuck Gould, CNS' local-access network technologies manager, said it is considering making a scanning tool available in the university computing labs so students can scan their diskettes.

Townsend said there also are rare circumstances where e-mail can transmit viruses.

"The only way it can is if someone sends you an attachment that is an infected, executable file, then you save that attachment to your hard drive and then execute that file," he said.

Security of personal information is another Internet safety issue.

"If you're transmitting private information like Social Security numbers, passwords, credit cards, then it's important that it be encrypted. That's also the meaning of 'secure server,'" said Neil Erdwien, CNS web-technologies manager.

Secure servers allow sensitive information to be transmitted safely. Erdwien said that an icon depicting a locked padlock will appear on the Navigator and Explorer browsers when a site is secure. Also, a secure site's URL will read "https" instead of "http."

Townsend said there also are risks in seemingly innocent Internet activities. Many Internet users enjoy interacting with people in chat rooms and Usenet newsgroups, but people can conceal or distort their identities online.

"You never know who's on the other end," Townsend said.

"There's an awful lot of people who have a great time in chat rooms and develop good friendships, and I don't want to knock those, but there's also a lot of people in prison or who have been hurt because of it, too."

For example, Townsend said that a Fort Riley man is in prison for trading child pornography with people in a chat room.

Students who are experiencing computer difficulties can consult the University Consulting Desk in Hale 313.

One service the desk provides is checking for viruses. Students can bring in an infected diskette, for example, and get the disk scanned and cleaned of the virus.

Students who think they might be a victim of an Internet crime can fill out a complaint form online, and CNS will help them contact the police.

"It is very rare, though, that we run into something that's illegal," Townsend said. "We run into a lot of things that are not good."

Crisp direction, excellent cast shine in Ebony Theatre show

BY RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

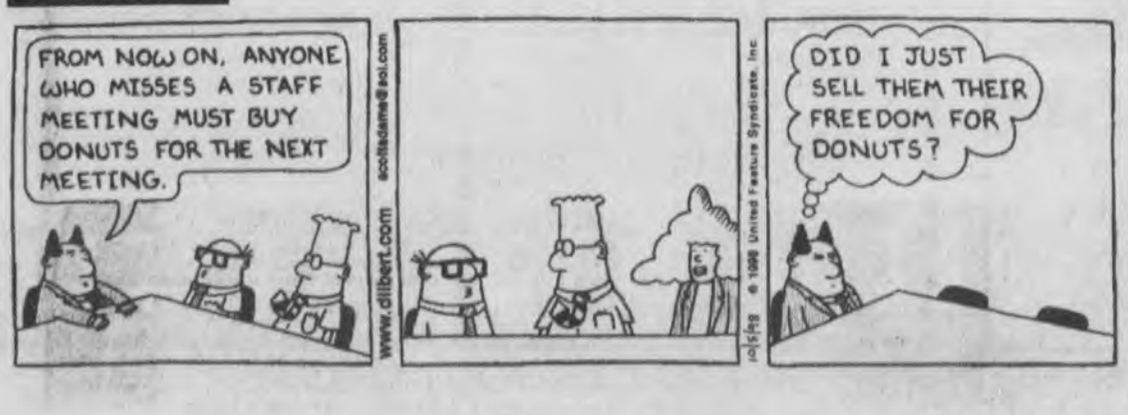
An exuberant cast and snappy direction gave Ebony Theatre's production of "Wine in the Wilderness," whose only performances were this past weekend, the spark of a great show.

Leading an ensemble of four actors, Tiffany Lee sparkled in the role of Tommy Fields, a rough-edged, seemingly ignorant woman who delivers her friends to self-awareness.

Fields is the central character in a play, written by Alice Childress, that deals with a slew of complex themes. Set following a 1964 riot in New York City, the play brings with it two distinctly separate understandings of black identity — rural and urban — and divides them among four characters.

Theater Review

The urbanites, Bill (Michael Parks) and Cynthia (Aundray Collins), represent the then-growing African-American awareness that was stirred by the rise of Martin Luther King Jr. and Malcolm X. The notion of "black is beautiful" becomes the central definition of identity for them — an intellectual couch from which a traditional stereotypically damning view of black society is satirized.



On the opposite polar and subject to Bill and Cynthia's own prejudice, Tommy and Old-Timer (Billy Williams) represent a rural and typically Southern concept of black identity. Tommy is headstrong, in-your-face, defiant and naive.

Old-Timer is similar to Tommy, but he is from a generation that was used to keeping out of the spotlight, to taking the back door instead of the front.

Bill is an artist who sees Tommy as the third phase of the African-American woman he is painting in a triptych (a three-framed painting containing a naive child, an African goddess and a backwater fool). But is Tommy (and even Old-Timer) willing to play to white notions of how blacks should behave, as Bill would have you think? When Tommy is transformed, removing her fussy wig and mismatched clothes, the natural woman Bill hasn't recognized emerges.

Skillfully directed by Donna Davenport, "Wine in the Wilderness" has set a high standard for all productions of the season.

Steve Hall, mayor of Manhattan; Jim Coffman, K-State provost; and Dan Yunk, superintendent of USD 383, all spoke at the Harmony Walk.

"We are here to respect and celebrate the richness diversity offers us in its many forms," Hall said.

Kelsey Needham, sophomore in pre-health professions, said Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week is good for many reasons, one being acceptance.

"It's one step towards being more accepting and aware of others' backgrounds and beliefs," Needham said.

Doug Benson, co-chair of the event and associate professor of modern languages, said simply knowing about differences and diversity isn't enough to change views and make people more accepting. To do that, people must have a sense of understanding.

"We're hoping that we can help people not just reach a level of tolerance, but to go beyond that to truly begin to understand each other," Benson said. "The week helps open up people's minds, and therefore, their lives."

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week not only gives people a chance to learn about others and prejudices against them, it also gives people a chance to look within themselves and evaluate their lives, Candi Pitts, event co-chairwoman, said.

"It gives everyone a chance to look into their own lives and spirit and evaluate who they are, where they come from and their place in the future," Pitts said.

As the 21st century comes closer, learning how to interact in an ever-diverse world is becoming more of an issue.

"The only way we can come together is to learn about differences, because people will lash out at what they don't understand," Benson said. "This gives them a chance to begin to understand and us a chance to demonstrate that we're all in this together and that we care about where we are 10 years from now."

All events, except the Racial/Ethnic Harmony Banquet, are free. All spots are filled for this year's banquet. Pitts said attending as many events as possible is good because it helps broaden one's understanding of differences.

"Lots of times people get wrapped up in their own worlds," Pitts said.

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week not only gives people a chance to learn about others and prejudices against them, it also gives people a chance to look within themselves and evaluate their lives, Candi Pitts, event co-chairwoman, said.

Benson said he agreed and said Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week is a starting point for future change.

"We hope people will get ideas of ways of living and working together," Benson said.

"We hope they can find ways of reducing discrimination and prejudices towards other racial and ethnic groups. It will make their own lives less frustrating."

FIEDLER

granted is our benefactor," Gov. Bill Graves said. "Because of the generosity of people like Alice Fiedler, we do see the difference in our students. Every student on this day — every Kansan — owes a debt of gratitude to Alice Fiedler."

After being thanked by both speakers and audience applause, Fiedler came to the podium to deliver some remarks that were at times highly emotional and at others ecstatic.

Saying thanks to her husband for making the gift possible, Fiedler said it was her husband who, for his whole life, felt he needed to give back to the school that had educated him.

"He told me one time that he wanted to do something for Kansas State University for the education he received," Fiedler said. "It's essential to get that education, and it's also important what you do with that education."

She also expressed thanks to Don Rathbone, dean emeritus of engineering, for acting as her representative throughout the planning and design phase of the building. She said she thought it appropriate Fiedler and Rathbone halls will sit side by side through the ages.

"I thank all of you for your friendship, both individually and collectively," Fiedler, a native of St. Petersburg, Fla., said. "You have welcomed me here, and I feel right at home."

Fiedler Hall will include 75,000 square feet divided among a library, auditorium, student study rooms and the Department of Civil Engineering. The project is to be financed by Fiedler's $5.3 million gift, another $1.7 million in private money and $5 million in state money.

The formal program included comments by Terry King, dean of the College of Engineering, and President Jon Wefald. Jason Lacey, president of Engineering Student Council, spoke, as did Rathbone.

Lacey addressed not only Fiedler but also the many engineering faculty and students in the audience.

"I'm talking about the undertaking of a challenge that you, Mrs. Fiedler, are giving us today, to the students and faculty," Lacey said. "A challenge to develop one of the greatest resources this university, this state and this nation has — knowledge.

"We hope the ground breaking of knowledge will happen every day from here on."

500,000 attend Pope's Mass in Croatia

By VICTOR L. SIMPSON
The Associated Press

SPLIT, Croatia — On a seaside beach packed with pilgrims, Pope John Paul II sought Sunday to heal the wounds left by war and totalitarian rule in Croatia and urged the international community to provide "timely help" to end the Kosovo conflict.

Hundreds of thousands of Roman Catholics jammed a beach outside this Adriatic coastal city for the final Mass of John Paul's three-day trip to Croatia. Scores of fishing and pleasure boats anchored offshore sounded their sirens when the pope arrived from the capital, Zagreb.

Adding to the estimated 500,000 people in attendance were Croat pilgrims from neighboring Montenegro, the smaller of two remaining Yugoslav republics, who streamed in when the border crossing was opened Saturday night for the first time since war ended in 1995, state-run Croatian television reported.

"Croats are today called to give a new face to their country, above all by committing themselves to the renewal in society of the ethical and moral values undermined by past totalitarianism and by the recent violence of war," the pope said.

"It is an urgent task, for without values there can be no true freedom or democracy."

The frail 78-year-old pope appeared in generally good form, but his voice was weak by the end of the nearly three-hour Mass. An aide held up a white umbrella to shield him from the bright sun as he sat on an altar facing the sea. He returned to Rome late Sunday.

Reconciliation and the renewal of values were high on the pope's agenda during his stay. The breakup of Yugoslavia sparked a civil war in 1991 that left over 10,000 dead and thousands missing before the 1995 Dayton Accords ended the fighting.

The big crowd was quiet as the pope delivered his homily but applauded when he spoke of Kosovo.

John Paul said he was following with "anxious concern the continuing tragedy" in the region of Yugoslavia, about 240 miles southeast of Croatia, where Serb forces have staged a bloody crackdown on ethnic Albanian separatists.

He said, "mutual respect, forgiveness and reconciliation" were needed to stop the violence and said he hoped the international community would "provide its timely help" to achieve those goals.

The pope made no mention of threats by NATO to stage airstrikes if the Serbs continue their aggression against the ethnic Albanians.

About 80 percent of Croatia's 4.7 million people are Catholic, and the Vatican looks at the country as a Catholic bastion in the Balkans amid Orthodox Christians in Serbia and Muslims in Bosnia.

Foster-care hotline off to slow start

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A state-sponsored hotline intended to generate reports about mishandled foster-care cases received only a few calls in its first week.

The hotline, which opened Sept. 28, was designed to allow professionals involved in a case to anonymously report possible mistreatment of children in foster care.

Rochelle Chronister, secretary of the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, established the line in response to a rise in unconfirmed reports of abuse since the foster-care system was privatized in March 1997.

Chronister said her goal was to "once and for all get to the bottom of these stories, which, I've learned, have a way of taking on lives of their own."

Shawnee County District Judge James Buchele, who organized the hotline at Chronister's request, declined to state specifically how many calls came in the first week.

Calls are restricted to professionals involved in a case: law-enforcement officers, doctors, nurses, lawyers, counselors, teachers, court officials and social workers.

"We think that with there being so much concern over exposure — people afraid of losing their jobs — it would be inappropriate to discuss this in the press," Buchele said. "But I can tell you that we have received some calls, and that some things are being looked into.

"I suspect that by the end of October, we'll put together a report on what we found — good or bad."

The hotline will accept calls until Oct. 15.

Teresa Markowitz, SRS commissioner in charge of services for families and children, said the hotline has not generated "a huge amount of calls" but said that "even if we got just one call, it would be worth doing."

Callers need to be aware that neither the social worker nor the worker's supervisor is told that a concern has been raised about how a case is being handled, Markowitz said.

"We're asking callers for specific information so that we know exactly what to look for," she said. "We don't want to go into this open-ended. If there's something going on, we need to know about it."

Killer who turns self in 19 years later leaves authorities uncertain of punishment

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SHAWNEE, Kan. — The confession of a Virginia man who killed a teen-ager 19 years ago, got away with it, became a father and a Christian and finally decided to come clean last month has solved a crime but created a moral dilemma, authorities said.

How to punish a man who killed but since has changed his life? A man who surrendered in a case that authorities say would not have been solved?

Daniel L. Crocker's decision to confess to killing Tracy Fresquez makes him deserving of some leniency, Johnson County District Attorney Paul Morrison said.

But given the brutality of the crime, a light punishment would be hard to justify, Morrison said.

"We certainly don't want to diminish the death of Tracy Fresquez in any way," Morrison told The Washington Post.

"But by the same token, I don't think there's any question about the fact that some allowances should be given for Mr. Crocker's act of turning himself in after 19 years."

Crocker, 38, was charged last week with first-degree murder in the strangulation and rape of Fresquez in her Shawnee apartment Oct. 6, 1979. Crocker, who had been living in Chantilly, Va., with his wife and two children, turned himself in Sept. 22.

His wife, Nicolette, said Crocker told her of his crime before they were married 11 years ago, and that his secret grew more troubling to both of them over the years.

In Chantilly, Crocker was a warehouse manager and an active member of the Fairfax Assembly of God Church and recently began ministering to a prison inmate. Nicolette Crocker said the prison experience heightened her husband's guilt, and he turned to a local pastor for help in surrendering.

Crocker made his first appearance Thursday in Johnson County District Court and said nothing. A preliminary hearing was scheduled for Oct. 30.

If Crocker is convicted, he will be sentenced under 1979 Kansas law. At that time, first-degree murder brought life in prison with parole eligibility after 15 years.

Morrison did not rule out the possibility of a plea agreement.

Committee votes for Clinton impeachment inquiry

Democrats try to limit inquiry, don't believe actions are impeachable

By DAVID ESPO
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In a historic step taken strictly along party lines, the House Judiciary Committee voted Monday night for an open-ended impeachment inquiry of President Clinton. Lawmakers were somber and partisan by turns, as the top Republican lawyer cited "substantial and credible evidence" of 15 possible grounds for impeachment.

The roll call for a formal inquiry under Watergate-style rules was 21-16, with all the panel's Republicans in favor and all Democrats opposed. The full House is expected to agree to the inquiry later this week, thus making Clinton only the third president in American history to be subjected to the threat of formal impeachment proceedings.

CLINTON

"Do we have a duty to look further or to look away?" Chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill., asked at midmorning as he gaveled the committee to order in the same cavernous room where Richard Nixon's fate was debated a quarter-century ago.

"This is not about Watergate," said Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, the panel's senior Democrat. "It's an extramarital affair."

Democrats tried twice to curtail the scope and duration of the inquiry and said that, even if proven, some of the allegations against Clinton do not raise to the level of an impeachable offense. Both times they were turned away on party-line votes, including on one proposal to limit the inquiry to Clinton's relationship with former White House intern Monica Lewinsky and force the case to be wrapped up by Nov. 25.

Under the rules adopted at the Republicans' insistence, Congress would be empowered to investigate not only Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's evidence relating to Clinton's relationship with Monica Lewinsky but other matters as well.

The committee would have power to subpoena witnesses and conduct hearings.

In an hour-long presentation to the panel, the Republicans' lead investigator, David Schippers, broadened the counts set out by Starr to raise the possibility that Clinton took part in a broad conspiracy to cover up his actions.

He also addressed the issue of Lewinsky's truthfulness, a key point since her testimony about some key details differs from the president's. "For the limited purpose of this report, we suggest that Monica Lewinsky's testimony is both substantial and credible," the attorney said.

The Democrats' top lawyer, Abbe Lowell, said the Republican staff had simply "subdivided" Starr's 11 charges without adding significant new allegations.

The committee acted as fresh polling evidence suggested the proceedings could help shape the outcome of midterm elections a month away.

GOP sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said a new survey taken for the Republican National Committee indicated that bedrock Democratic voters have begun expressing greater interest in the election than they did only two weeks ago, but still not as much as Republican voters. The finding comes after a period in which Democratic officials have been accusing the GOP of

A GRACIOUS LADY

JEFF COOPER/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Alice Fiedler stands in the atrium of Durland Hall on Monday morning. Fiedler has contributed almost half the cost of expansion for the engineering complex, which will be named Fiedler Hall in honor of her late husband, George.

"WITHOUT THIS ONGOING EDUCATION, THIS WORLD WILL BE STAGNANT."
— ALICE FIEDLER —

Alice Fiedler's support of K-State has won her a place in many hearts

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Although Alice Fiedler was born in New York, something about her suggests she might very well have been a native Kansan.

Friends describe Fiedler as generous, sensitive and kind — an angel with heartland values. Upon introduction, she smiles and is eager to talk. In interviews, she's warm and eloquent, never revealing much effort in delivering her thoughtful answers.

In a word, Fiedler is gracious.

It's that characteristic grace that has been charming the campus since Friday, when Fiedler cut a purple ribbon to start construction on the $12 million, 75,000 square foot Fiedler Hall and Library. The hall is the third phase of the engineering complex, which includes Durland and Rathbone halls. Fiedler donated $5.3 million to the project in honor of her husband, a graduate of the College of Engineering who died in 1988.

Manhattan has kept Fiedler, who lives in St. Petersburg, Fla., busy this week. However, her recent obligations belie the fact Fiedler is a sensitive and delicate woman, a poet no less.

"As I've told my friends many times, I wonder if I write the poems," Fiedler said, an accomplished poet who has recently published a book of her work, which is available in the K-State Union Bookstore. "They just come to me completely made — as if dictated. It's just hard to understand."

Fiedler's poetry is elegant and feminine but has an old-fashioned sensibility the poet admires. Many of the poems can read as love letters to George, with whom she shared 50 years of marriage. However, the poems aren't necessarily suggestive of a woman who would fund the construction of a high-tech library and classroom building.

Not that Fiedler is any less proud of George's contributions to electrical engineering, which are substantial.

George Fiedler rose in engineering during the atomic age, when advances in manufacturing and electronic equipment drastically changed the world.

After earning a bachelor's degree in electrical engineering in 1926 at K-State, George went on to earn a master's in 1932 at the University of Kansas and a professional degree at K-State in 1934.

Following his education, George Fiedler worked for General Electric and Radio Corporation of America as well as the Navy. He also taught in higher education and spent many of his years leading up to his 1968 retirement developing groundbreaking designs in automation and instrumentation.

George Fiedler soon after was made an original member of the College of Engineering's Hall of Fame. In 1988, Alice Fiedler established an endowed chair in both her and George's name. She also has endowed a scholarship for students.

Don Rathbone, dean emeritus of engineering, has been friends with Fiedler for more than a decade. He's easily one of her greatest admirers.

"As we get older, you have to decide to do something that would have lasting value — to help not only this generation of students but also to those who come," Rathbone said. "She's been a tremendous supporter and very generous."

Needless to say, education is important to Fiedler. So, the gift of Fiedler Hall was a logical choice for her.

"If the world is going forward, it's going to take these people who are

Lucky's, KJ's top ABC's list of citations

By TRAVIS D. LENKNER

Alcoholic Beverage Control has filed administrative citations against three Manhattan bars and one liquor store as a result of enforcement violations earlier this fall.

Lucky BrewGrille was cited the most, receiving six citations for eight counts of allowing minors to possess alcohol. The bar faces a potential $3,400 fine and 10 days of license suspension.

Two of the MIP violations were from a catered event at the Sigma Nu fraternity on the weekend of Aug. 22 during an ABC enforcement effort that netted 61 violations.

KJ's Bar and Dance Club received five citations for six counts of MIP and could be fined $2,100 with a seven-day suspen-

Panhellenic reinstates Kappa Delta sorority

By SUZANNE WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

Kappa Delta sorority officially was reinstated at the Panhellenic Council meeting last night. The vote was 9-2 in favor of reinstatement.

Kappa Delta closed its doors as a K-State sorority in 1993. Lindsey Roy, Panhellenic Council president, said there were a lot of issues involved when Kappa Delta's national council chose to close. Barb Robel, adviser for Greek Affairs, said it partially was due to a decrease in the number of pledges.

Christine Schwermann, national director for Kappa Delta collegiate membership, said she feels it is the right time to come back. She said there has been a sufficient amount of time since the closing of Kappa Delta, and the number of women who participate in Rush Week at K-State is increasing.

"We usually average around 500 women for Rush, but this year we had around 600 that participated," Robel said.

Karen Babcock, Delta Delta Delta member, said members of her chapter discussed the possibility of opening another sorority. She said there was concern it would affect the number of women who would pledge

DB92 manager placed on temporary leave; performance evaluated

Len Potillo, general manager of KSDB-FM 91.9, has been placed on administrative leave while administrators evaluate his performance and decide whether he will keep the position.

"I have been looking into Mr. Potillo's performance of his duties," said Peter Nicholls, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences. "I have asked him to go on administrative leave while I conduct this inquiry.

"He is not expected to perform the duties of his position, but he is still on the payroll and still receives his contract salary," Nicholls said.

Candy Walton, an employee at DB92 since last August, is acting as interim general manager.

Nicholls said Walton is not Potillo's replacement. She is just standing in for him and helping to run the station.

Walton said she didn't know how long she would be acting as station manager.

"I've asked not to be in the loop," Walton said.

Walton said she believed the reasons for Potillo's leave were personnel issues.

Support of Potillo at the station is mixed, Walton said. Some employees are good friends of Potillo's; others just want to be on the radio.

"I'm going to make a decision about his status fairly soon," Nicholls said. "Probably this week."

Potillo was placed on leave more than two weeks ago.

Graves, Sawyer debate open-meeting laws, other Kansas issues

WICHITA — Kansas' open-meetings law has gone "too far" when it restricts the ability of public officials to talk on the phone with each other, said Democratic gubernatorial candidate Tom Sawyer on Monday.

But Gov. Bill Graves said legislation to weaken the open meetings act overreacts to a problem that public officials should be able to deal with among themselves.

Attorney General Carla Stovall last month affirmed her earlier opinion that serial communications among members of a public body constitute a meeting under the law. Known popularly as "calling trees," serial communications involve members calling or e-mailing one another, one after the other, to engage in a discussion.

Speaking before The League of Kansas Municipalities meeting in Wichita, Sawyer called that decision ridiculous.

"Although in general I support the open meeting law, I think we have gone too far," Sawyer said.

The governor, who earlier this year vetoed a bill that would have weakened the open-meetings act, was somewhat more restrained.

"Tom has the luxury of calling the attorney general's decision ridiculous. I have to say it needs some clarification," Graves said.

Most of the other questions at the candidate forum dealt with issues revolving around local control and local taxation.

Both candidates came out strongly in support of letting locally elected officials make decisions affecting their communities.

That included a proposal, expected to come up this next session, for uniform statewide liquor laws.

Sawyer said he would support a cleanup of liquor laws but did not support anything that would take away local control from communities.

"I wouldn't support anything impeding local decisions you already make," Graves said.

Sawyer told the group he would favor giving cities the power to levy a local option income tax as an alternative to property taxes.

Graves said cities need greater discretion on how to fund their public services.

"If you are elected to do a job, you should have the tools to do it," he said.

Also of concern among the city leaders was how revenue would be replaced if the Legislature reduces or eliminates the motor vehicle tax. Sawyer said cities should be concerned about the state holding up its side of the bargain on the motor-vehicle tax.

"Based on past history, I don't know if you can trust us," Sawyer told the group.

Graves took exception with that, saying that 95 percent of the time relationships between the cities and state government has been good.

Hot-air balloon crash kills 1, injures 12 after striking power lines

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — An oversized hot-air balloon struggling with high winds plunged to the ground after striking power lines Monday, killing one passenger and injuring 12 other people.

The red-and-yellow balloon split apart when it hit the lines at Kirtland Air Force Base, cutting off power to the base for two hours. The gondola broke free and fell about 18 feet to the ground, Col. Jim Stevens said.

The balloon had been flying for about an hour when pilot Thomas Thompson decided to land in a field because winds had become too high. Winds pushed the balloon down too fast and into the power lines, said Mark Flett, a member of the balloon's chase crew.

One woman was killed in the crash. Three passengers were reported to be in serious condition at University Hospital, the area's trauma center, and nine others were listed in satisfactory to fair condition.

Thompson, 51, was among those injured with a broken ankle and a cut chin.

Most hot-air ballqons carry only a handful of people, but the Wayfinder balloon's gondola could hold 20, Flett said.

The balloon was not among the more than 800 balloons taking part in the 27th-annual International Balloon Fiesta that began Saturday.

On Sunday, a California woman broke a leg and another woman suffered rib injuries when the hot-air balloon in which they were riding made a rough landing after being hit by wind on the nearby Sandia Pueblo.

High winds forced the organizers of the event to put scheduled events on hold Monday morning, but some pilots were flying at their own discretion during that time.

Modern-day problems spread to Amish sect

PHILADELPHIA — Two Amish men pleaded guilty Monday to conspiring to sell cocaine to fellow members in a case that threw a spotlight on how modern-day problems are encroaching on the sect's simple way of life.

Abner King Stoltzfus, 23, and Abner Stoltzfus, 24, could get five to 40 years in prison and up to $2 million in fines. No sentencing date was set.

The men are not related; Stoltzfus is a common name among the Amish.

Prosecutors said that from 1992 to 1997, the two men bought cocaine from a Philadelphia-area motorcycle gang called the Pagans, then sold the drugs to Amish youth. Eight members of the Pagans also have been charged.

The accusations shook Lancaster County's 22,000 conservative Old Order Amish, who isolate themselves from the outside world and shun modern conveniences. They ride horse-drawn buggies and dress in plain, black clothes.

Some Amish said the sect has had to grapple with alcohol and marijuana problems for a decade. Word of Amish young people using hard drugs prompted the community's bishops to send a letter to all the churches, warning about cocaine.

At the time of their indictment, the Stoltzfusses were participating in a "timeout," a period during which young Amish men and women are allowed to explore the outside world and decide whether to join the church. Both men intended to join, their lawyers said.

The courtroom Monday was packed with people in Old Order Amish dress.

"It's a very gratifying thing for a judge to see that an individual's family and peers are supporting him in a time of genuine need," said U.S. District Judge Clarence C. Newcomer.

LOOKING TOWARD THE FUTURE

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week founder envisions leadership, self-introspection

By JENNIFER WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

Concerns for the future of our nation, multicultural education and the damage done to ethnic people were expressed by Barbara Baker, a graduate student in language, literacy and culture at the University of Massachusetts.

Baker, the founder of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week, spoke Monday evening to a group gathered in the K-State Union Ballroom .

"I hope you will see these visions as a starting point for inspiring your own leadership and your own self-introspection," Baker said.

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week was founded by Baker in 1989 when she was an undergraduate student at K-State. Baker said it was a time when students of color expressed their concerns about the lack of involvement of non-majority populations in society.

"When I presented the idea of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week to the Student Body President's cabinet, we came to an overwhelming consensus that Racial/Ethnic Week was needed to incorporate a welcome presence for the leadership of people of color in critical campus and community life," Baker said.

Baker said she wanted this event to link universities and communities together.

Candi Pitts, event co-chair, said the week encourages a permanent change in attitude.

"It's more than changing for a week. It's about changing our lives," Pitts said.

Flood kills 7 in KC area, 2 still missing

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Stranded atop a car on a bridge over a fast-rising creek, Orlando Hudson talked to his wife by mobile phone. The car started to move.

"He said, 'I'm going to have to jump, or I don't know what I'll do,'" Hudson's sister, Mary Bronson, quoted him as telling his wife.

Hours later, recovery teams found the bodies of Hudson, 27, and Bonita Black, 43, caught in trees 100 yards downstream in Brush Creek — an 11-mile flood control waterway that flows through metropolitan Kansas City, Mo.

Hudson, who had been driving home with medicine for his week-old son, and Black were among seven people confirmed dead Monday in metropolitan Kansas City in the wake of fierce storms that dumped up to 6 inches of rain on the area.

A third body was recovered Monday afternoon from Brush Creek. The name of the victim was not immediately released.

Searchers who had worked all day in light rain took a final walk along the banks before darkness set in. The search for the other two missing people was to resume in the morning, said Brad Humston, public information officer for the Fire Department.

Two motorists were killed in suburban Johnson County, Kan. Police said Walter Knott, 83, was swept away about 8:30 p.m. as he got out of his stalled car on a street in Overland Park. His body was found three blocks away several hours later. In nearby Lenexa, 27-year-old Kenneth W. Tucker Jr. was found about a half-mile from his car.

A woman whose body was found about 9:30 p.m. on a creekside tennis court in Kansas City, Mo., remained unidentified Monday, police said.

And 9-year-old John W. Parmerlee disappeared into a creek behind his home in Blue Springs, Mo., about 20 miles east of Kansas City, Mo.

The Brush Creek tragedy unfolded before dozens of witnesses who watched a Mercedes-Benz become trapped on the Prospect Avenue bridge. A sport utility vehicle followed the car, but it, too, became trapped, and its roof became a refuge for the five occupants of the two vehicles.

Firefighters went toward the bridge in a boat but could not reach it before the water reached the five people.

Bars, underage drinkers need to be responsible

Everyone should be accountable for the choices they make.

Underage people who consume alcohol are making a conscious choice to put themselves in danger of being cited. It doesn't matter if it's in a bar or not, it's still an MIP.

Bar owners and managers who allow those under 21 to drink in their establishment are taking the same risk.

Underage patrons who choose to drink are taking advantage of the system. The whole point of an 18-to-enter, 21-to-drink establishment is to give those who aren't old enough to drink a place to have a good time. When these establishments are forced to shut down because of violations, whether on a suspension basis or even permanently, the opportunity is lost.

On its last big trip through Manhattan, the Alcoholic Beverage Control handed both Lucky BrewGrille and KJ's Bar and Dance Club citations. Each establishment will face fines and suspension, pending appeals. It seems like these two bars are the same ones we hear about every time the ABC comes to town.

To some, it might seem like they are being singled out. But when there are obvious violations occurring, there really isn't any reason for the ABC to stop checking those bars, even though underage drinking does occur at other bars in Aggieville.

Some time ago, Jeff Fellows, owner of KJ's, said he believed allowing 18-year-olds in the bar would cut back on violations.

In a Collegian story earlier this fall, Fellows said students using fake IDs caused many of the problems, but with the 18-year-olds using their own IDs, they wouldn't see so many violations.

That's fine for the front door. What happens once the minors are in line at the bar? The rules need to be enforced.

Even in an establishment that is 21-to-enter, like Lucky BrewGrille, there are policies to be enforced. Sure, it's dark when bouncers are trying to check IDs, but that's why they make flashlights. Individuals are in charge of letting people in the bar, but in the end, it's the business that loses.

To the bar owners: follow the rules. Take care of yourselves.

To the underage drinkers: don't take advantage of your opportunity to go to a dance club. These 18-to-enter bars eventually could shut down if they lose their liquor licenses.

It's a tough line to walk, but if everyone involved steps up and follows the rules, problems down the road can be avoided.

Thieves take part of family when dog stolen from porch

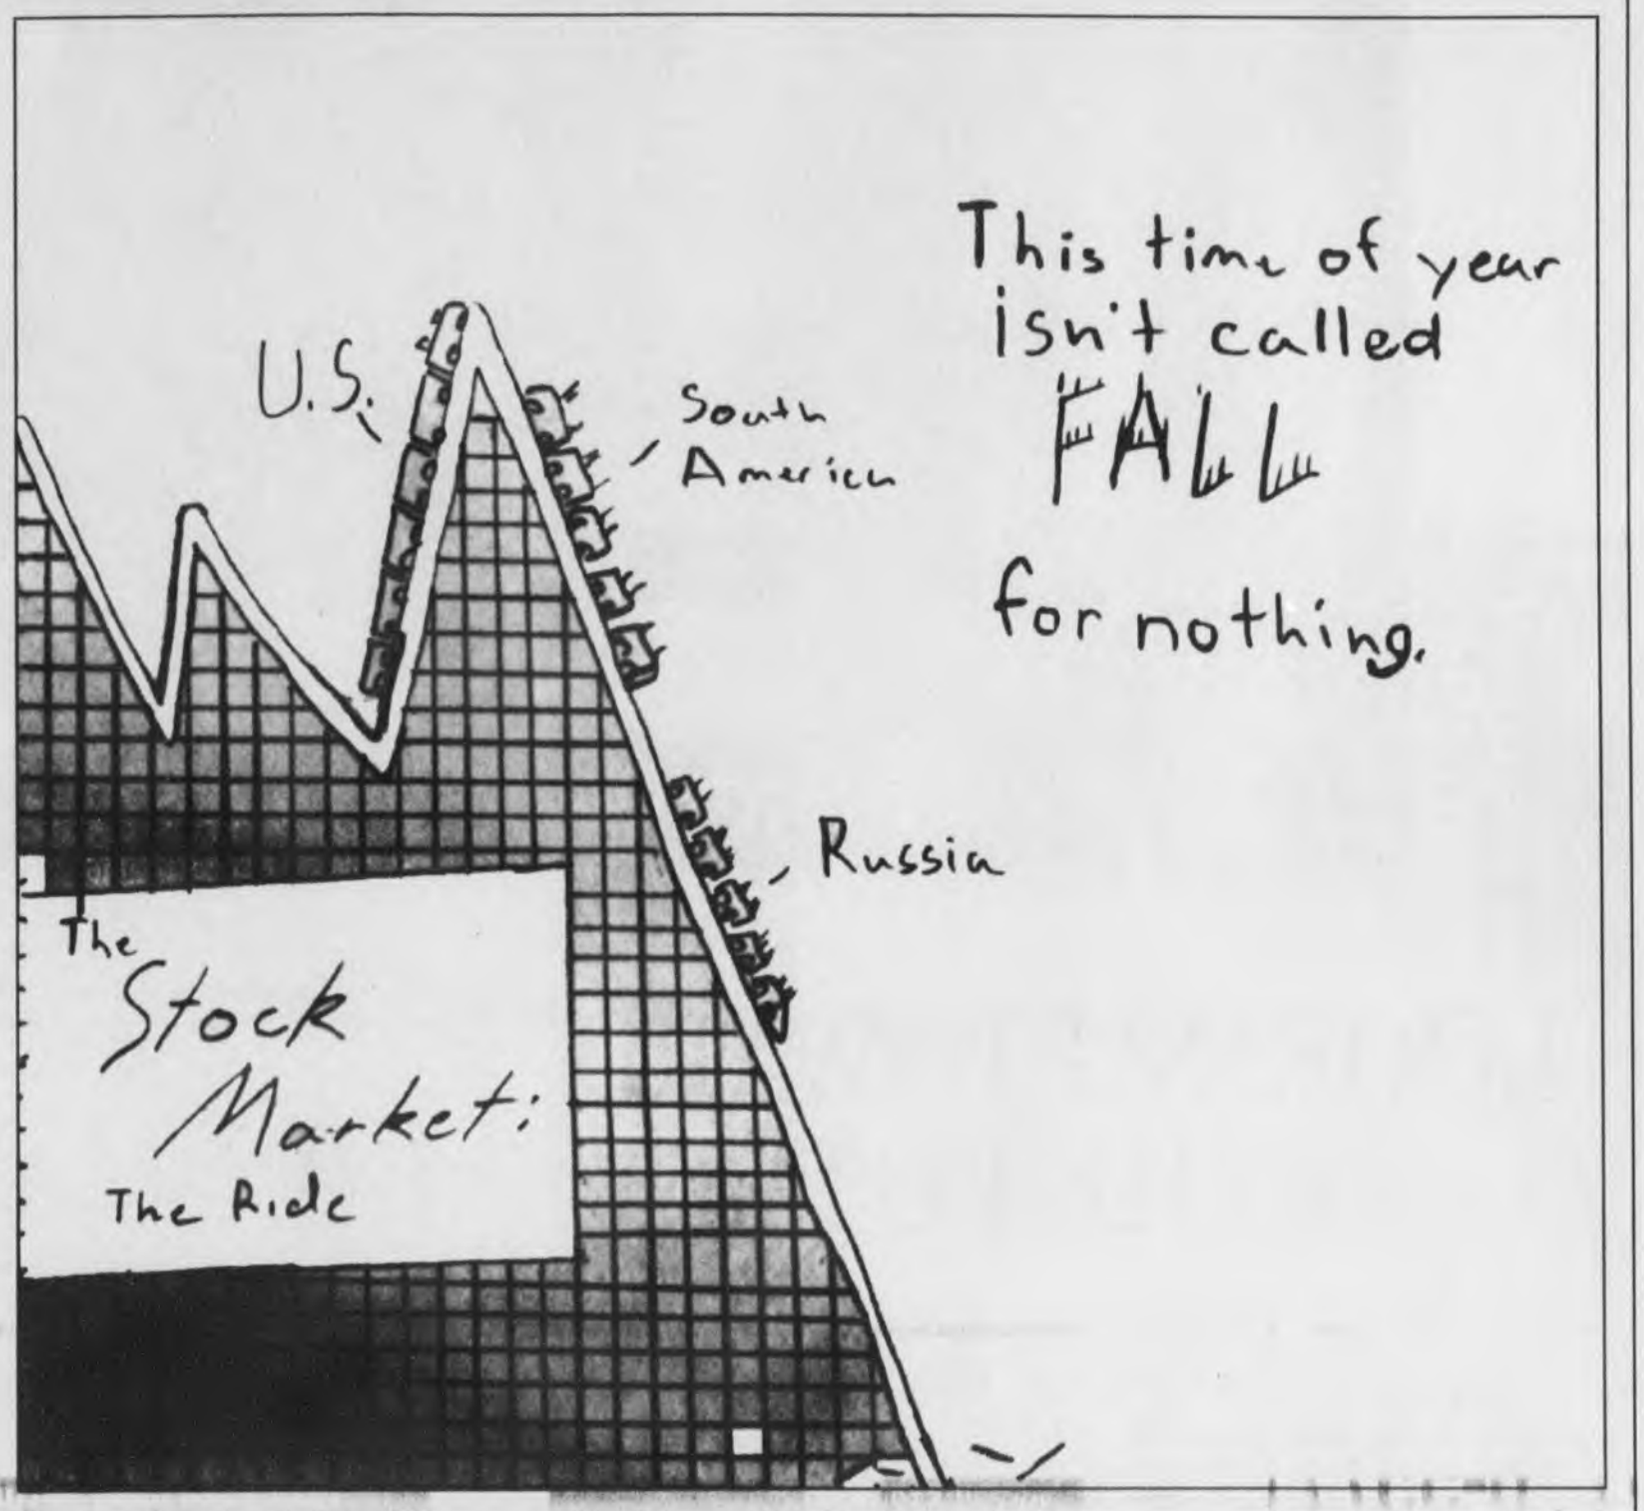
Editor,

Warning, dog owners — there might be dog thieves in town.

Between the hours of 12:30 and 6:30 a.m. on Sept. 19, a part of our family was stolen from my mother's front porch. The thieves took her collar off and rolled it and her rope neatly on the porch. Then, with complete and utter boldness, they left with our family member of five years. Princess, our black toy poodle with a white patch on her chest, was taken from the porch and now is in the hands of people who do not realize her history.

Since 1993, the family routine has been for Princess to stay with my 82-year-old mother as a companion for her during the day, while my twins are at school and I am at work. After school, my twin daughters then would go to their grandmother's house to pick Princess up.

Also, during these years, Princess developed a medical condition, defined as inverted sneezing, which displays asthma-type symptoms. Princess requires her medication for this disease, and the thieves do not have this medication to help her. Whenever Princess has an episode, she will collapse and not be able to breathe unless her medication is given to her. Without this knowledge, the thieves already might have killed my dog and family member.



The tragedy is the greater effect on my family. My mother has been literally sick and in bed since this occurred, because she defines this the same as a death in the family. My daughters and I have gone through many boxes of tissue, and it becomes hard to speak of Princess being gone.

If anyone has our Princess, please, search your heart and return her to her family who have loved and cared for so long. If you don't want to return her to us, then turn her into the animal shelter as a lost dog, no questions asked.

Otherwise, dog owners of Manhattan, beware. There are bold thieves just waiting for the opportunity to take a precious family member from you.

AARON FRUEHLING

K-State lucky for strong theater department

VIEWPOINT

CHRIS PIATT

In 1943, the German censors in France were dumber than dishwater.

When Antigone killed herself, they assumed it was because Creon, the mean tyrant king, was right. They thought she was surrendering to the fascist dictatorship and making the right choice in doing so. Stupid Germans.

The students and faculty of K-State, on the other hand, are considerably brighter. Enter the Department of Speech Communication, Theater, and Dance.

Thursday night, "Antigone" opens on the stage of Nichols Theatre. A lot of us had to read this puppy in high school English classes. It is the third installment in the Oedipus trilogy, and, surprisingly, has a smaller following than "Return of the Jedi."

This version, however, has no "thees" or "thous," no blind seers and no togas. Jean Anouilh's translation is plain spoken, completely user friendly, and, at times, surprisingly funny. K-State's treatment will be a genuine crowd pleaser.

K-State theater is a consistently excellent showcase of talented students and creative faculty. Unfortunately, with the exception of students writing critique papers for extra credit in assorted classes, the student body tends to stay away from K-State shows.

This weekend would be a great time to break that streak. Under the direction of Charlotte MacFarland, the cast of "Antigone" is a terrific ensemble of performers. In addition, the play contains all the big crowd draws: violence, sexual scandal, some big laughs and more family infighting than a week's worth of Jerry Springer episodes. Also, like well-staged professional wrestling, this production is staged in an arena format.

Students pay $6, which is what most of us forked over this summer to watch Ben Affleck save the Earth from the asteroids. The entire play lasts less than two hours, so it won't cut into your social life, either.

Most importantly, it promises be a truly excellent production. Live theater is not like other types of entertainment. The actors could drop dead at any moment, which gives it a unique edge. The performers and the audience are in the same room, breathing the same air. There is no experience like it.

K-State also will be presenting the no-holds-barred absurdist comedy "The Bald Soprano" in the Purple Masque Theatre, and "Caberet," which is currently a smash on Broadway, in McCain Auditorium this semester. Those shows will be dynamite, too.

Try cutting your teeth on "Antigone" first. You're not in high school anymore, so there will not be a quiz this time around, and you don't have to buy the Cliffs Notes to figure out what the hell everybody is saying. A lot of us performed in plays in high school but don't have the time or the commitment for college theater. However, you still can enjoy great plays on your own campus.

In 1943, German censors nixed a lot of theater. They even had subversive playwrights and theater artists put to death by government officials.

No one in K-State theater is in danger of being decapitated by the campus cops, though, and thank goodness. We need and value their work.

Try on "Antigone" for size. You won't be disappointed.

Play on.

Chris Piatt is a sophomore in theater. You can e-mail him at crp3280@ksu.edu.

Rigid structure of Catholicism suffocates columnist

VIEWPOINT

MARY VANLEEUWEN

Mary Elizabeth. I was given the first name of my mother, my grandmother, and the Blessed Virgin Mother of the Lord. I was given the middle name of St. Elizabeth, mother of John the Baptist. My family wanted me to be a nun. Mary Elizabeth is a wonderful name for a nun.

I love everything about my family, including their respect for the Catholic religion, and on Family Weekend, I humored them by going to church. At that Catholic Mass, I was reminded of all the reasons I tossed religion aside in order to find out what I believed.

Catholicism is largely based on the ceremony of the Mass, which is where all the magical stuff comes in. We remember Jesus' life and death, we recap his teachings and the Last Supper, we proclaim our undying vows and then we share in the true body and blood of Christ, in the form of bread and wine.

Some people really believe it and find fulfillment in it, but I don't think I ever really did. The reasons for my disapproval of religion became more and more developed as I grew older.

First of all, like many people, I was never given a choice as to what religion I wanted to follow. My parents vowed at marriage to raise their children Catholic. My youth was predetermined four years before I was born.

So, I went to religion class, followed Catholic doctrine, had my first communion, confessed my sins on a regular basis, got confirmed and so on and so forth. Sure, I could have said I didn't want to do any of that, but I love my family, and I didn't want to hurt them. Leaving the faith while living at home would have torn them up and hurt our growing relationship with each other.

I never really understood what religion meant when I was growing up. It was all just a set of rules that I had to follow to be a Catholic. I was too young to understand fully what I was doing. I remember after my first communion (the first time you receive the body and blood of the big kahuna) when I was seven, I genuflected toward the back of the church and made the sign of the cross with my left hand. I didn't understand what a first communion really was, let alone why my parents were so upset and embarrassed that I couldn't even sign and genuflect in the right way.

The fact that I didn't have a choice made me feel suffocated every time I went to church or religion class.

Secondly, the structured Mass really bothered me with its standard format. "Say these lines here!" "Praise God with these words now!" After I learned it all, the words started coming from my mouth out of habit, not of love. I often wondered how many parishioners were just saying them out of habit as well, perhaps all of them who weren't nuns.

When I actually stopped to think about what I was saying, I realized I didn't agree with any of it. By being there, I was blaspheming a god I didn't even believe in. I saw God as a fictional being made up by a bunch of people who thought one god was better than many gods. This God hadn't been around forever. There were many religions before he came along, so how can we be sure they weren't right?

This is the credo I've fine-tuned since I came to K-State. Leaving home allowed me to choose what I did and did not want to practice.

I'm not without respect for the Catholic religion. Like I said, some people can find solace and fulfillment in religion and others, like me, just can't.

I think the only thing that really matters is that you're a good person and that you're happy.

The priest we saw on Sunday gave a wonderful sermon on unconditional love within the family and for others. I love my family and friends unconditionally, not because a god tells me to, but because I want to.

Though my family is unhappy with my choice, and they think less of me, they know I'm a good person and they'll always love me whether I'm a Christian or a heathen.

One of the things I loved about being a Catholic was that you always knew that God would love you unconditionally.

Now, I see that I have more than enough unconditional love. I don't need God as an imaginary friend.

Students can appeal parking tickets

■ Process gives students an opportunity to tell their side of the story.

By DESIREE LAMBERSON
Kansas State Collegian

Students returning to their cars and finding a ticket on the windshield have a chance to appeal the ticket instead of paying the fine.

Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said in order to appeal a ticket, the alleged offender must fill out a form available at the Parking Services office, Edwards 103. Abbott said it is better to go into the office instead of calling.

"We prefer that people come in, because we need to take the time to walk them through the process," he said.

On the form, alleged offenders have a chance to tell their side of the story. Abbott said the person may add additional pages, drawings and photos.

Once the form is complete, it is sent to judges on the appeals committee, which is made up of students, faculty and staff.

The positions are appointed by Student Governing Association, Faculty Senate and Classified Senate.

If the two judges for a case agree on a decision, it stands. If they do not agree, the case is sent to a third judge to break the tie.

If the appeal is approved, Abbott said the ticket is removed from the person's file and he or she does not have to pay the fine.

If it is not approved, the person must pay the fine.

Abbott said the fine does not increase and the payment will not be considered late because of the time the appeals process takes.

Most appeals are denied, Abbott said.

"More appeals are denied than are approved," he said. "An awful amount of tickets go in that they really didn't expect to go through — it's a delaying tactic."

Abbott said that nearly 10 percent of all tickets are appealed.

"A year ago we wrote 45,000 tickets, but some of those were never issued because they had mistakes or were mutilated," he said.

Abbott said many denials occur because the person did a bad job of telling his or her side of the story.

"Some people are just angry and don't do a good job of appealing," he said. "(The judges) don't know your story — they weren't there, so you shouldn't just write 'I don't deserve the ticket.'"

Abbott said that if the ticket was issued mistakenly, the person does not have to go through the appeals process.

"We aren't going to make people appeal when it was our fault," he said.

But Noureddin Ibrahim, graduate student in electrical engineering, said that he was forced to appeal a ticket that he said he did not deserve.

Ibrahim, who lives in Jardine Terrace Apartments, received a ticket for parking without a permit nearly two weeks ago, even though he owns a Jardine parking permit. Ibrahim's rear-view mirror had been broken, so he placed his parking permit in the front seat of his car.

"Unfortunately, my rear mirror broke," Ibrahim said. "This has happened before, so I just put my permit on the front seat — it was clear to anybody."

Ibrahim said he received the ticket while he was at home during a football game.

"I saw at least 10 cars parked there without a permit, so I understand that the person was just busy giving tickets and didn't look," he said.

Although he owns a parking permit, Ibrahim's ticket is being appealed.

NATO attacks possible if offensive continues

By DUSAN STOJANOVIC

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — With NATO attacks said to be only days away, a top U.S. envoy arrived Monday with an 11th-hour warning to Yugoslavia's president to halt his crackdown on ethnic Albanians in Kosovo or face airstrikes.

Richard Holbrooke began talks with Slobodan Milosevic on Monday evening after arriving from Brussels, Belgium, where he conferred with senior NATO officials.

Before boarding a plane for Belgrade, Holbrooke said conditions in the southern Serbian province had not improved since the alliance started two weeks ago to finalize plans for air raids to force Milosevic to halt his offensive against Kosovo Albanian separatists.

Holbrooke said he planned to drive home to Milosevic "the extreme gravity of the situation." Holbrooke negotiated the peace deal with Milosevic and other Balkan leaders that ended the 3 1/2-year Ban war in 1995. In Washington, D.C., President Clinton expressed concern that Milosevic was "playing the classic game of making false promises" to avoid NATO military strikes.

In a telephone call with Russian President Boris Yeltsin, Clinton said Milosevic's compliance with U.N. demands "must be verifiable, tangible and irreversible," press secretary Joe Lockhart said at the White House.

"What happens next depends on President Milosevic," Lockhart quoted the president telling the Russian leader, who has opposed the use of force against Moscow's longtime ally.

As Holbrooke tried to resolve the crisis through negotiations, British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook said a decision on NATO military action was imminent.

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING
RECENTLY, MORNINGSTAR CALLED US CHEAP.
IT'S NOT EVERY DAY YOU GET A COMPLIMENT LIKE THAT.
All financial companies charge operating fees and expenses—some more than others. Of course, the lower the expenses you pay, the better. That way, more of your money goes where it should—towards building a comfortable future.
We make low expenses a top priority.
As the largest retirement system in the world[1]—a nonprofit company focused exclusively on the financial needs of the educational and research communities—our expenses are among the lowest in the insurance and mutual fund industries.[2]
In fact, TIAA-CREF's 0.31% average fund expenses are less than half of the expense charges of comparable funds.[3] It's why Morningstar—one of the nation's leading sources of annuity and mutual fund information—says, "At that level [TIAA-CREF] is cheaper than any other [variable annuity] policy, and is even competitive with the cheapest mutual fund complexes, though it offers far more benefits."[4]
"TIAA-CREF sets the standard in the financial services industry."
Of course, expenses are only one factor to consider when you make an investment decision. Morningstar also noted our commitment to "consumer education, service" and "solid investment performance." Because that can make a difference in the long run, too.
At TIAA-CREF, we believe people would like to spend more in retirement, not on their retirement company. Today, over two million people count on that approach to help them build a comfortable and secure future. So can you. To find out more, call us at 1 800 842-2776. We'd consider it a compliment.

Grbac to start for Chiefs on Sunday at New England

BY DOUG TUCKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — While Arrowhead Stadium still was drying out from the blinding rainstorm of the night before, Kansas City coach Marty Schottenheimer said Monday that Elvis Grbac will start as quarterback this week at New England.

Grbac injured his shoulder against Oakland in the season opener and has been sidelined while backup Rich Gannon steered the Chiefs to a 3-1 record, including a 17-6 victory over Seattle on Sunday night in a game delayed 54 minutes by lightning and rain.

In 10 games the past two seasons in relief of Grbac, Gannon has gone 8-2. This year, he's hit 66 of 122 passes for 850 yards and two touchdowns. Both of his losses have come at Jacksonville.

"We're going to leave him home in Jacksonville, and we're going to leave me home in the playoffs," said Schottenheimer, who's notorious for his woeful 5-11 postseason record.

Grbac, beset by injuries since coming to Kansas City as a free agent in 1997, has similar statistics. He was 8-2 in 10 games as a starter last year and was a winner in the first game this year against Oakland, when he was injured.

Gannon, an 11-year veteran, scored the Chiefs' first TD Sunday night on a 4-yard bootleg run and then put the game away with an 80-yard touchdown pass play to Andre Rison, who showed he's fully recovered from a hamstring injury.

Gannon is probably a bit more mobile than Grbac, who is probably a little better passer.

Through it all, Schottenheimer has sought to defuse any budding quarterback controversy.

"In my opinion and the opinion of our football team, we have established who the starter is, and that's Elvis. We've got to get him back in the harness," he said.

At the same time, he admitted there is little difference between the two.

"They're both obviously winning performers. I think each has own little qualities that set him apart from the other. I don't think we'd have called for the first touchdown if Elvis had been in there. We drew that one up in the dirt, or the mud."

Besides his physical ability, Gannon offers the added benefit of having a perfect attitude for a backup quarterback. Despite his own success, he seems entirely content to stay No.2 and go back to the bench every time Grbac gets healed.

"It's hard to express the appreciation a head coach has for a guy like that. He's everything you're looking for and (playing time) is never an issue," Schottenheimer said.

"I'm of the opinion that Elvis Grbac gives us the best opportunity of winning. If he's not available, Rich Gannon can do the same thing. There probably isn't a lot to choose from between the two."

In the meantime, Arrowhead Stadium workers were busy repairing the ripped-up field and repairing leaks. Water came pouring into the pressbox at one point during the first half, and even the Chiefs' locker room had problems.

"It was an inch of water in there. It was unbelievable," Schottenheimer said. "There was a place it was coming in — I don't want to say Niagara Falls — but it was coming through there heavy. They were in there vacuuming it out while we were still in there. It was unbelievable."

It might hurt his chances at college football's most coveted award, but Michael Bishop has set a clear goal for himself this season:

TEAM 1ST, HEISMAN 2ND

Team First. That's the unofficial name of Michael Bishop's Heisman campaign, so leave the poor quarterback alone while he tries to guide his team back to Tempe, Ariz.

Oh, he can sense it. Believe you me, the preseason All-Big 12 quarterback feels the invisible question marks bounce off him like 80-mph footballs to the back of the head.

Will he win the Heisman Trophy?

In Manhattan Town Center. In Aggieville. In Intercultural Communication class. In the K-State Student Union. He knows what you're thinking by the surprising glare that flashes across your face when you turn the corner and nearly nudge the Heisman Trophy candidate and scuff his Air Jordans.

You gasp at his presence and think to yourself, while walking away, "Oh, did I almost hit the Heisman Trophy candidate? He could win K-State the national championship! He could play in the NFL! Give Tampa Bay its first Super Bowl trophy! Make millions! ..."

That's enough.

GAME TIME SET
Saturday's game against Colorado has been selected to be televised by fX, and kickoff has been shifted to 6 p.m.

We're at four days and counting before K-State uncovers another chapter to this decade-long saga that began in June 1988 and has continued to build strength ever since.

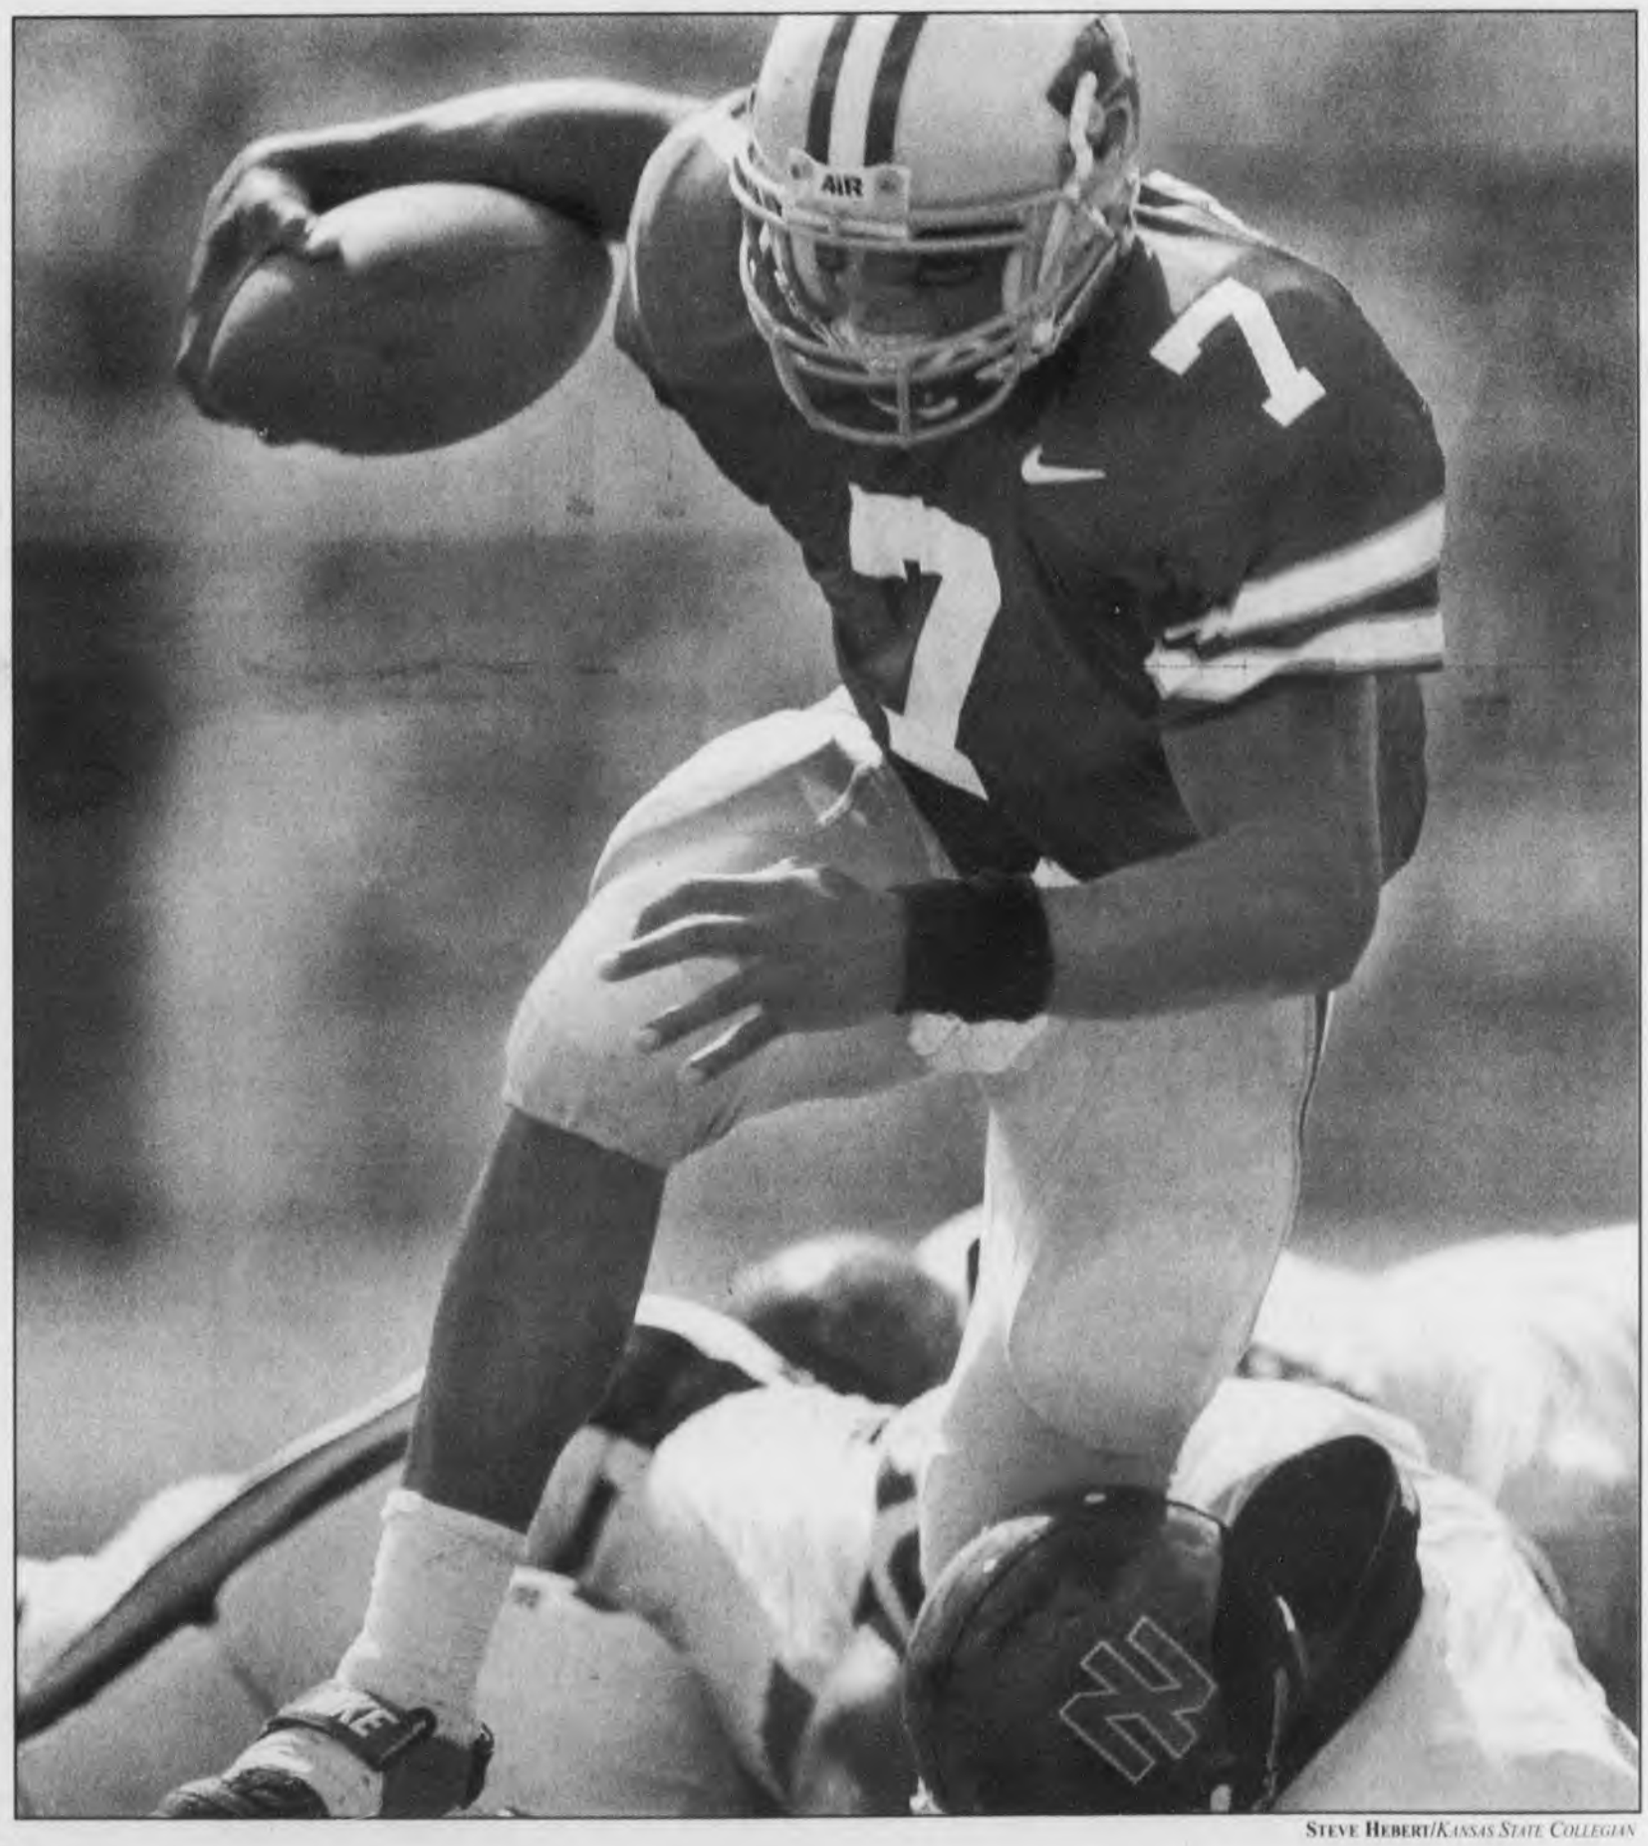
We're witnessing the best part of the story, which once was called the greatest turnaround in college football history. Do we dare call it a turnaround anymore?

Go ahead. Ask Bishop what he knows about the first couple seasons of Coach Bill Snyder's tenure. He'll admit to you that all he knows is that K-State was not good in the "olden days."

However, after a first season at K-State that made the Little Apple delirious with national-championship dreams, Bishop is caught in the highly dramatic ending, his final season, which some say, is for all or nothing for K-State football.

Progress by earlier pioneers — Chad May, Matt Miller and Brian Kavanagh — who came before Bishop and guided the Wildcats to unprecedented heights, illustrated the fact that nobody wins nine or 10 games without a great quarterback.

However, Bishop continues to redefine greatness with weekly acts of brilliance that have rewritten K-State's record books. He won 11 games in his first season. He transcended a brand of communicable competitiveness that bread invincibility among teammates and fans. He took a nation hostage a few weeks ago with eye-popping statistics and has wowed NFL scouts.



"I guess it's just something in my blood," Bishop said with a shrug. "It's always been in my blood. I think I was just born with it."

How else in the name of Lynn Dickey could you explain it?

You see, Bishop has a dream. It's a dream that began the first time he donned a helmet at age 8. It's quite simple, really: Bishop wants to win a Division I national championship.

During his four years at Willis High School in Texas, where Bishop played quarterback, middle linebacker, place

Women's golf team struggles in tournament

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Kristy Knight knew that the first Big 12 tournament showing would feature several competitive teams and that it would be a test for K-State.

In the Big 12 Preview, Friday through Sunday in Austin, Texas, women's golf struggled and shot 324-325-340-989, for a 12th-place team finish.

Senior Jane Yi led the K-State squad, finishing with a tie for 27th after posting 76-79-81-236. Mitzi Taylor shot 81-79-84-244, and Traci Benninga finished with 84-82-90-256 to round out the top-three K-State scores. Carrie Chambers was unable to continue in the final round due to illness and withdrew from the tournament.

"It was a bad tournament," Knight said. "In order to have a good tournament, you need three people playing good and and a fourth playing decent golf with some good scores.

"Mitzi had a bad start, but made a comeback. Carrie had been ill last week and on medication. Then we got down there we found out that the Texas hills had had bad allergy problems," Knight said. "She had an asthma-related reaction to the area. At the tail end of the first round it started getting hotter, and she started feeling worse. The safe thing to do was to have her stop."

Knight said she wants the team to be able to move on and not dwell on the tournament and that she knows the team can play better.

"It was just a bad tournament," Knight said. "It didn't happen this week for us. We stubbed our toes this weekend. I know they did their best.

"When playing with the Big 12 Conference, there is not a lot of room for error. They played well and I expected that. We knew it would be a tough tournament for us," Knight said. "I think we are a better team than what we played like. We know we can do better than that, and we'll just have to get after it next week in Indiana."

This week is a week of fine tuning and adjustment with a chance to practice the basics without the pressure of qualifying rounds for the next tournament, she said.

"It's good that they can get in a lot of quality practice," Knight said. "They need time to get back and work on the fundamentals of the game. It's no fun to play bad, but they're looking forward to the rest of the season. Hopefully, it will be a motivating factor from here on out."

Cornhusker quarterback questionable for game

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LINCOLN, Neb. — Nebraska starting quarterback Bobby Newcombe is "a little questionable" for Saturday's game at Texas A&M and will see limited action in practice this week, Huskers coach Frank Solich said.

"He made excellent progress for a period of time and we thought he was over the hump," Solich said Monday. "Now his progress has slowed down dramatically and is really at a stop."

Solich said Newcombe was not at 100 percent in Saturday's 24-17 squeaker over Oklahoma State. The sophomore missed Nebraska's second and third games of the season after partially tearing a ligament in his knee, then came back Sept. 26 to lead the Huskers to a 55-7 victory over Washington.

Newcombe had some difficulty executing the option Saturday, rushing for 22 yards on 13 carries, Solich said. He did pass for 112 yards, completing 9 of 15 throws.

"Bobby wasn't in as good of shape as he was the week before against Washington," Solich said during the Big 12 Conference coaches' telephone news conference. "We had thought he was about 90 to 95 percent."

Newcombe did not practice Monday and the Huskers planned to limit the number of repetitions he takes during workouts this week, Solich said.

No. 2 quarterback Eric Crouch, who had been bothered by a pulled hamstring, suffered a bruised hip against Oklahoma State and also would be limited somewhat in practice, Solich said.

"Obviously, it's not a good situation when your top-two quarterbacks are getting limited snaps in practice," he said. "But getting those guys healthy is going to be a necessity for us this week."

No. 3 quarterback Monte Christo is set to take most of the snaps with the first-string offense throughout the week while No. 4 quarterback Jay Runty also will get some practice time with the top unit, Solich said.

Also injured is split end Kenny Cheatam, who will be out for an extended period of time after separating his left shoulder against Oklahoma State, Solich said.

Cheatam's absence means the Huskers will be without the services of both starting receivers when Nebraska (5-0) faces No. 18 Texas A&M (4-0) in College Station, Texas. Starting wingback Lance Brown remains sidelined with a broken foot. Brown is at least a week away from returning to practice.

New meatless food products help vegetarians, vegans meet vitamin, mineral requirements

While utilizing meat as a source of protein is an unappealing idea for vegetarians and vegans, meat is an important source of vitamins and minerals that must be compensated for in other ways.

"When you're not eating meat, you need to supplement in other ways," said Michael Testagrossa, manager at Derby Food Center. "If you take vitamins, you get the iron and nutrients you're missing."

Testagrossa said vegetarians can maintain a balanced diet as long as they watch what they eat. Lacto-ovo vegetarians, who will not eat meat but still will eat eggs and dairy products, can get their required protein from eggs, milk, yogurt and other dairy products. Vegans, vegetarians who will not eat anything that came from an animal, can find nutrients in foods such as legumes, beans and sprouts.

"Vegans need to pay closer attention to what they're eating, since they can't get the easy protein from milk and eggs," said Michelle Netson, a registered dietitian at Derby Food Center.

Besides the usual food choices, many products are being introduced to the market, especially for vegetarians. The gardenburger, a favorite at residence hall dining centers around campus, is a partly soy patty that tastes similar to a hamburger. Tofu, a food introduced in the past few decades, is formed from coagulated soy and is very rich in protein.

Netson said vegetarians should make sure they are providing their bodies with an adequate amount of amino acids, which are essential for normal body functions.

Netson also said the Department of Housing and Dining Services encourages students to visit with registered dietitians, who can help formulate a healthy meal plan.

Testagrossa said it is important for anyone considering a vegetarian lifestyle to remember changing one's diet composition from four food groups to three means compensating in other areas. Consulting a doctor is never a bad idea for those thinking of alternative diets, he said.

"You should always research a diet, no matter what it is, and find out how it will affect you," Testagrossa said.

Facilities provide meatless options, welcome suggestions from students

BY JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Netson said suggestions can be helpful to the food-preparation staff, and eventually lead to satisfied diners.

Vegetarians who have trouble finding meatless meals can count on food centers around campus to provide a few opportunities.

The Department of Housing and Dining Services makes sure all dining halls have a variety of selections available for students.

"We always provide a hot vegetarian entree at lunch and dinner," said Mary Molt, assistant director of Housing and Dining Services.

Molt, who is also in charge of menu choices for the residence hall dining centers, said she makes sure students who don't care for meat will have an option at mealtimes.

Different varieties of vegetarian meals available at Derby, Kramer, and Van Zile food centers include pasta, beans, rice, tofu and a well-stocked salad bar.

Residents who are not satisfied with their meals are encouraged to visit with dining hall dietitians for information on other food options.

"We always welcome students to visit one-on-one with dietitians to help them find what will meet their needs," said Michelle Netson, registered dietitian with Derby Food Center.

Netson said suggestions can be helpful to the food-preparation staff, and eventually lead to satisfied diners.

Anyone who isn't interested in residence hall food can frequent the K-State Student Union.

The Stateroom, where students can choose among a variety of food types, features a vegetarian entree each day. Pasta and veggie eggrolls are popular, and students can build their own sandwiches, without meat. Upstairs at the Bluemont Buffet, more vegetarian main dishes can be found, and the salad bar is always available.

The Bookplate Cafe, Hale Library's dining cart, and the Arch Cafe, in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, feature many vegetarian items for people on the run.

Side salads — fruit, vegetable and pasta — are meatless, and varieties of bagels and yogurt are available. Meatless sandwiches, such as egg salad, peanut butter and jelly, and the tomato-veggie are also tasty options.

Students gain career experience through internships

■ Several campus services exist to help students in finding internships.

BY LYNETTE ABITZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

New York models glide down the runway while Wichita dignitaries drink cocktails.

As an intern for Sullivan Higdon & Sink, Bree Bisnette, senior in public relations, has spent many hours preparing this gala which promotes a new Proctor & Gamble hairline, Physique.

Bisnette is one of many students who have gained career experience through internships.

Mary Marston, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said the job market is great right now and fields that might not pay high salaries are looking for interns.

"More and more companies are looking to internships to see who they are going to hire," she said.

Marston said it has become "old-fashioned" to serve only one internship between your junior and senior year of college. She said all companies look at students starting their sophomore year if they have some skills — about half of employers will take freshmen.

CES has sessions in résumé building and interviewing. It also has listings of internships on file in Holtz Hall. Marston suggests students pay the $10 fee and put their résumé on the World Wide Web through their office. This can be done on the CES Web page or by visiting the office.

Students then have access to JobLine, a listing of internships and jobs. Marston said this gives students practice in preparing a résumé and gets their name out to employers.

Students can interview for internships at Holtz Hall. There are purple sign-up sheets in the hallway. These sign-ups remain for three days, and then companies choose who they will interview based on résumés. Students then can sign up for an interview time.

Marston said another source for internships are the Career Fairs, sponsored every semester by CES.

Jeff Grant and Mike Grimm, seniors in mechanical engineering, received their internships at Boeing through contacts at the Career Fair. They also participated in résumé critiques and interviews at Holtz, and said the sessions were helpful.

Grimm served his second year at Boeing this past summer. He entered his internship with some anxieties.

"I wasn't for sure if I could actually perform like I was supposed to," he said. "There's a big difference between what you learn in class to solving a real-world problem."

Grimm was placed in an area where he had no background in the classroom. He said his placement, however, was valuable.

"I got to learn in a totally new area in engineering. I learned on the job and learned fast," he said.

Grimm said his internship also taught him how to communicate with people, depending on their area in the company.

While Grant learned more about his field, he also developed other skills.

"I've learned a great deal about how business works from upper-level management on down," he said. "It was good to get that knowledge."

Both Grimm and Grant's internships were paid, and they received health, dental and life insurance. Housing was also available. They worked 40 hours a week.

Bisnette found her internship through the Journalism and Mass Communications Career Fair last fall. She spoke with a representative from Sullivan Higdon & Sink who told her how to make a winning portfolio. Bisnette made a 3-D portfolio using the theme 'Getting my Foot in the Door.' She sent a rubber foot with her portfolio.

At first, Bisnette was intimidated by the firm's large size, and she feared she wouldn't have opportunities to participate in bigger projects, she said. However, she said she found she enjoyed the family atmosphere of the company.

Bisnette worked 50 to 60 hours a week during the six-week paid internship. She spent much of this time working with teams in the communication field. She said the team atmosphere was difficult at times.

"It made me more in tune with what other facets of the profession have to deal with," she said.

Bisnette said she encourages students to make face-to-face contact with those influential in hiring interns.

"It is a lot more convincing, and it helps them associate you with their application," she said.

She also suggests putting your full effort into about three companies, because it will yield better results.

Grimm suggests students start looking for internships their sophomore year and said they shouldn't limit themselves to the companies coming to K-State.

Both Grimm and Grant said students should research the company they plan to interview with and prepare questions to exhibit their knowledge of the company.

All of the hard work put forth to receive an internship pays off, they said. Students gain experience and build connections.

Bisnette reaped the benefits of her internship after her 14-hour day preparing for the Wichita gala she planned. As the evening ended, her boss pulled her aside and told her how many compliments she had received for Bisnette's personal and professional conduct.

"It made me forget all the turmoil and trials," Bisnette said.

Campus art structures display creativity, imagination of former K-State students

By Suzanne Wilson
Kansas State Collegian

Most sculptures on the K-State campus date back to 1969, when students enrolled in a summer workshop class began proposing their ideas to the university.

The workshop, "Art in Situation," was offered to students in the departments of Art, Landscape Architecture and Architecture.

"Students spent the first part of the summer working on proposals and making models," Rex Replogle, associate professor of art said. "They had to present their models to the university for approval."

He said the second half of the course was spent building the sculptures that had been approved.

Seven permanent sculptures were made by students in the workshop between 1969 and 1971. Replogle said many other projects were done with the workshop that are no longer on display. He said many of them have been destroyed or painted over.

The large sculpture that stands in front of King Hall is an untitled piece by James Wentz, a former art student.

John Vogt, associate professor emeritus of art, said although many students refer to this sculpture as "the fork," that is not what Wentz meant it to be.

He said Wentz used Styrofoam and a wooden armature to support the plastic and fiberglass form.

Alan Jones, former student in art, built a sculpture for the fascia of Lafene Health Center in 1969. Jones used slabs of uncut and unfired bricks to carve his motif, which can be found at the south entrance of Lafene today.

An untitled sculpture just west of Denison Hall was created in 1969 by Nick Zack, former student in art. The sculpture consists of three different forms that are meant to relate to each other. Zack used stainless steel and poured concrete to construct the desired shapes.

Robert Hudson, former student in art, constructed an untitled sculpture on the lawn east of Seaton Hall in 1969.

Hudson carved shapes out of Styrofoam that were placed on a wood support. He then poured concrete into the sculpture and removed the Styrofoam and wood support once it dried.

The workshop was an opportunity for students to develop their own ideas in the design projects and actually carry them out, Vogt said.

Not all sculptures on campus come from the workshop. One of the less-modern sculptures on campus is a bust of William Alexander Harris, a Kansas farmer, U.S. soldier and politician.

The bust is located just outside the north end of Fairchild Hall. It is the only sculpture on campus of which the date of its making is unknown.

"Spiral Jade," a sculpture designed by Lee Lubbers, artist and Jesuit priest, was placed in front of Kedzie Hall in 1976.

This was an experiment using large-scale industrial equipment. Lubbers shaped a train axle into a desired motif, then welded the axle onto a train wheel.
